The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan: Page 2, line 10, after the word "powers," insert "and in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. GOOD. I make the point of order on that. It is not germane to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, it certainly is not germane to have the Department of Agriculture do the work or cooperate in this work. If the Department of Agriculture would only cooperate a little more with itself, it would accomplish a great deal in this respect. [Laughter.] Take as an illustration an item under the Bureau of Markets, where we have different bureaus in the Department of Agriculture getting information as to the price of cheese alone, and then talk about cooperation with some one else! There ought to be cooperation within the department and within the various bureaus of the same department. Here is a provision where I do not expect to see any cooperation; but I do insist that when we put on a provision here to the effect that the Federal Trade Commission shall do certain work that it is now doing we should not put on an additional provision that some other department shall have any connection at all with the work that is to be done by the Federal Trade Commission. It seems to me it is not germane at all to the paragraph. If adopted and the subsequent results do not justify the expenditure, the excuse will be that Congress by asking two departments to do the work prevented any good results to flow from the appropriation.

Mr. HAUGEN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HAUGEN. To discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. HAUGEN. The Department of Agriculture has heretofore been cooperating with the Federal Trade Commission. The fact is we got but little information from the Federal Trade Commission until the Department of Agriculture cooperated with the commission. The Department of Agriculture has the power under the law to get information that the Federal Trade Commission has not got. If appropriation is made we should give them the authority. The Federal Trade Commission has not the authority. It is clearly a limitation on the appropriation.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. HAUGEN. If that work is being done by one department and it is the intention to duplicate the work in addition, then it is an unnecessary expense.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman will see at once the difficulty. Which one is going to appoint agents and send them out over the country? Will the two together have to appoint them? Will they divide it up, and will the Trade Commission appoint half or a quarter and the Department of Agriculture the remainder? This runs to the Trade Commission alone. It may be that it would be in order to offer an amendment for the Department of Agriculture to cooperate, but by this amendment we legislate.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will say to the gentleman that I have no quarrel with the Federal Trade Commission; but the fact remains that the Department of Agriculture has authority under the law to get the information, which the commission has not, and for that reason authority was given the Department of Agriculture, and it came to the rescue of the commission, and we now have valuable information; as a result both are rendering valuable service along that line.

Mr. CANNON. I am not denying that.

Mr. HAUGEN. For that reason it is necessary to cooperate and to make an appropriation for the commission. We have made an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture. And I take it that it is now necessary to add to the appropriation made for the commission. If not, why increase the appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. Which one would make the appointment?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is immaterial. They both have their agents.

Mr. CANNON. You have got to make it a legal appointment.

Mr. HAUGEN. I take it that agents would be sent out both from the Department of Agriculture and from the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I am not very strong on these points of order; but if the amendment I have offered is subject to a point of order, then the ruling invoked against it can be invoked almost every day when we are considering appropriation bills, because nearly every appropriation bill carries provisions for cooperation between different departments of the Government. It is not unusual. It is done for the purpose of preventing duplication of work.

The Department of Agriculture is now doing this kind of work. It has been doing these very things, at the request of the Federal Trade Commission, for which we are proposing to make this appropriation of $150,000, and I will venture the opinion that if this appropriation is made, a part of the work will be done by the Department of Agriculture at the request of the Federal Trade Commission. As I said before, the Committee on Agriculture is now considering a comprehensive cold-storage bill, and one section of the bill imposes a duty on the Secretary of Agriculture which is thought to be proper and necessary in connection with the regulation and control of cold-storage warehouses and cold-storage products. That duty is to ascertain the amount, the ownership, the transportation, the prices, and so forth, of the kinds of food products stored in cold-storage warehouses. It seems to me it would not be proper to pass a cold-storage bill without including in it some provision of that kind, and that it is a proper and necessary duty for the Secretary of Agriculture to perform in connection with his work of supervising cold-storage warehouses and the cold-storage business. We should make some appropriation for that. I think everyone would think it is proper, and the Secretary of Agriculture will be doing that work when that bill becomes law; the Federal Trade Commission will be doing similar work under this appropriation, and there will be duplication.

There will be no trouble about a conflict of authority, as suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], if these two agencies cooperate. This cooperative work is done every day. There are numerous instances in which cooperative work is done by and between the different departments of the Federal Government; and, while each may be jealous of its authority, and while there may occasionally be some difficulty in arriving at a conclusion as to which one shall select the employees and direct the work, they evidently reach satisfactory conclusions, because this cooperative work is going on all the time among the departments of the Government. I submit that the amendment I offer is not subject to a point of order, and if it appeals to the judgment of the committee as I think it should, it will be adopted.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, it is very evident that gentlemen have not read the hearings at all, and it only illustrates how widely we may go astray in offering amendments on the floor of the House, based on some preconceived notion and not founded on the hearings at all.

What is it that the President wants the Federal Trade Commission to do? The President wants the Federal Trade Commission under this appropriation to make an investigation and report on meat, on shoes, on leather, on textiles, on lumber, on canned goods, on coke, on coal, on steel, and so forth. Has the Department of Agriculture anything to do with an investigation of shoes, or steel, or lumber, or textiles? And what will happen if you adopt this amendment? In my opinion this will happen: I do not think we are going to accomplish anything in reducing the cost of living by this investigation, but I do think if you do not appropriate a fair sum you will give a good excuse to some people as to why they did not accomplish something. We denied the Agricultural Department their estimate.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman says the President wants the Federal Trade Commission to get the figures in relation to steel and shoes and all that kind of stuff. How will they get it if you authorize them to get the figures in regard to the ownership, manufacture, and distribution of foodstuffs and other necessaries and by-products arising therefrom?

Mr. GOOD. "As the President may direct." We did not draw the language. The language was submitted by the Federal Trade Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentlemen that they are discussing the merits of the proposition and not the point of order.

Mr. HAUGEN. In reply to the gentleman's assertion, the Secretary of Agriculture has that authority now. If the gentleman will turn to section 2 of the food-production act, he will find the authority given on all the articles necessary for production.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This is an appropriation for the Federal Trade Commission, connected with its activities provided for by statute. The amendment is to insert, in line 10, after the word "powers," the words "cooperation with the Department of Agriculture." The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane, and also that it is legislation upon one of the general appropriation bills.

An examination of the paragraph discloses that this is an appropriation for expenses necessary in connection with information that may be collected by the President of the United States, within the scope of the powers of the Federal Trade Commission.

The amendment seeks to provide that the investigation shall be conducted in cooperation with another branch of the Government, namely, the Department of Agriculture. In the view of the Chair it is clearly not germane to the paragraph to which it is offered, and it is also in the nature of legislation. The Chair therefore holds that the amendment is out of order. All time on this paragraph has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

National Museum: For heating, lighting, ventilating, electrical, and telephonic service for the Freer Building, $14,715.

To enable the Regents of the Smithsonian to heat, and to fit up for an exhibition of the aircraft and accessories produced by this Government since the declaration of war, the temporary metal structure erected in the Smithsonian Grounds by the War Department under the authority of public resolution No. 5, approved June 9, 1917, $14,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to transfer the custody and control of the said building to the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I can understand the necessity of heating this building, for surely any American citizen who enters this exhibition having in mind that we expended a billion dollars and seeing what it produced with that money will certainly get a chill. [Laughter.]

I would like to know why we have to spend $14,000 when we have already appropriated money for this very purpose in the resolution?

Mr. GOOD. The question of heating the building is not in issue. In explaining the matter the following statement was made:

The money required is principally for sheathing the building so that it can be heated. The building is of metal and will have to be sheathed and ceiled at an estimated cost of $6,000; $1,000 will be required for the floors and $2,000 for the roof; $4,400 for purchase and installation of radiators, piping, valves, and other fittings; and $600 for painting. The total cost is estimated at $14,000. We will heat it from our steam plant.

The committee carried the estimate as provided and in the language provided for.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it a permanent exhibition?

Mr. GOOD. A permanent exhibition. The building is turned over to the Smithsonian Institution by the War Department.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Salaries: For additional officers and employees in the Department of State during the fiscal year 1920, $100,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $4,500 per annum.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 15, after the word "annum," insert "And provided further, That hereafter a fee of $3 shall be collected for the issuance of each and every passport."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, at the present time the Department of State receives for issuing passports the sum of $727,481 per year. It appears at the same time that the employees of the Department of State are receiving the smallest salaries which can be paid for the arduous and exacting work they are doing. They are all overworked, and on account of being underpaid many of them are resigning and entering private employ at larger salaries. There is no reason why people applying for passports should not pay the sum of $3. By this amendment there would be brought into the Treasury of the United States at least $1,400,000 in addition to the $727,000 received during the past year. I have a letter here written by the chief of the bureau explaining the number of passports issued and other valuable information in reference to this important service. I do not know of any logical reason why $3 should not be charged for each passport. I therefore think that the amendment should be adopted. It will bring into the Treasury at least a million and a half dollars a year additional without a single individual feeling it, because everyone leaving this country can well afford to pay $3 for a passport. If they had to pay for the postage they would have to pay 12 cents additional for each passport mailed. To-day the Government simply receives $1. Let us be fair to the people and at the same time pay these highly trained employees a living wage.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa insist on the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, personally I am in favor of increasing the fee for passports, but I will say to the gentleman that a committee of the House is now considering the extension of the passport law. I do not feel, therefore, that the Committee on Appropriations ought to take jurisdiction of this legislative provision, and I therefore make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the letters which I have read may be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting at this point in the proceedings the letters referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 13, 1919.

Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL,
House of Representatives, Washington.

DEAR MR. SIEGEL: In response to your request, I send you herewith a memorandum giving the approximate amount of the fees received by this Government in connection with the issuance of American passports and the viséing of foreign passports. I hope that this estimate will be sufficient for your purposes.

Very sincerely, yours, R. W. FLOURNOY, Jr.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
BUREAU OF CITIZENSHIP,
June 12, 1919.

DEAR MR. FLOURNOY: In accordance with your directions, I have ascertained the number of passports issued during the week beginning June 4 and ending June 10. The number is 1,922. Taking this as an average, during a year we issue approximately 99,944 passports to persons making applications in the United States. Under the espionage act of June 15, 1917, a fee of $1 is required to be charged for the issuance of a passport. It will be seen that during the course of a year the department realizes approximately $99,944 from this source.

Under the act mentioned a fee of $1 is also charged for the preparation and execution of applications for passports. This service was performed by the department and its passport agents in New York and San Francisco in 668 cases during the period beginning June 4 and ending June 10, and the fees, amounting to $668, have been or will be turned into the Treasury. The balance of the applications were executed before clerks of the Federal and State courts. The fees collected by the clerks of the Federal courts for this service are turned into the Treasury through the Department of Justice. The fees charged by the clerks of State courts for this service are not turned into the United States Treasury. I have been unable to ascertain whether the fees are retained by the clerks or are turned into the State treasuries. As the passport rules require that where there is both a Federal and State court (and this is generally the case in all large cities) the application must be executed before the clerk of the Federal court, the result is that about two-thirds of the applications upon which passports are issued are prepared and executed before clerks of Federal courts or before the department or its passport agents in New York City and San Francisco. The approximate number of applications executed before clerks of such courts, the department, and its passport agents during the period mentioned was 1,281. During a period of one year, taking the above as a fair average, 66,624 applications are prepared and executed by the department, its passport agents, and clerks of Federal courts, and, as the fee of $1 in each case is turned into the Treasury, approximately $66,624 is realized by the Government from this source. In addition to the above, the Government derives considerable revenue from the fact that this department declines to issue passports upon about one-fourth of the applications which we receive; or, in other words, it declines to issue passports in about one-third as many cases as it issues passports. Assuming that two-thirds of the applications turned down were executed before the department, its passport agents, and clerks of Federal courts, it will be seen that during a year approximately $22,213 is derived and turned into the Treasury from the preparation and execution of applications upon which passports are not issued.

We receive weekly approximately 300 applications for passports executed before American diplomatic and consular officers abroad. The fee for the preparation and execution of an application abroad is, as you know, the same as in the United States. From this source we derive during a year approximately $15,600, and from the passports which the department issues upon these applications we derive $15,600. The average number of applications prepared and executed and upon which emergency passports are issued by diplomatic and consular officers abroad is about 250 per week. The annual revenue from this source is approximately $26,000.

Mr. Schnare, of the visé section, states that, in his opinion, approximately $40,000 a month is now being turned into the Treasury by this department as fees for the preparation and execution of applications for and the granting of visés to aliens desiring to come to the United States. From this source about $480,000 is derived annually by the department and is turned into the Treasury.

The issuance of certificates of registration by consular officers abroad probably results in about $1,500 annually being turned into the Treasury.

The following is a summary of the sources and the approximate revenue derived by the Government for work performed in or directed from this division:

The average number of passports issued annually, based upon the number of passports issued during the week beginning June 4 and ending June 10 is 99,944, from which the Government derives the sum of	$99,944
The average number of applications prepared and executed before the department, its passport agents, and clerks of Federal courts, and upon which passports are issued, is 66,624, from which the Government derives the sum of	66,624
The approximate number of applications prepared and executed by the department, its passport agents, and clerks of Federal courts upon which the department declines to issue passports is 22,213, from which the Government derives the sum of	22,213
The approximate number of applications prepared and executed by American diplomatic and consular officers abroad is 15,600, from which the Government derives the sum of	15,600
The approximate number of passports issued upon applications prepared and executed before American diplomatic and consular officers abroad is 15,600, from which the Government derives the sum of	15,600
The approximate number of applications prepared and executed abroad and upon which emergency passports are issued abroad is 13,000 annually, and as $1 is charged for the performance of duties in connection with the application and $1 is charged for the issuance of the emergency passport the Government derives from this source the sum of	26,000
The approximate number of certificates of registration issued by American consular officers abroad is 1,500, and from this source the Government derives	1,500
The approximate fees received annually for the preparation and execution of applications for and the issuance of visés to aliens desiring to come to the United States are	480,000
Total	727,481

The Clerk read as follows:

FOREIGN INTERCOURSE.

To reimburse the appropriation "Emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, fiscal year 1920," on account of allotments made therefrom for expenses of the American Mission to Negotiate Peace, $388,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. In line 20 on page 3 there is provided the sum of $388,000 on account of allotments made on the appropriation for emergencies arising from the Diplomatic and Consular Service, fiscal year 1920, on account of expenses of the American mission to negotiate peace. Has the gentleman the figures as to the amount that the peace mission has cost the Government up to date?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have not the amount of the expenses of this mission up to date. The gentleman will recall the statement of the President some time ago to the effect, as I remember it, that it had cost about $1,500,000. Here is also the estimate that the expenses from December 1, 1918, to December 1, 1919, will be about $1,500,000. The situation was this: The President asked for an appropriation of $825,000 for the expenses of the American mission to negotiate peace.

Mr. FESS. When was that amount asked?

Mr. GOOD. That was asked in these estimates. The date of the letter is August 28. The committee requested rather detailed information as to the expenditures up to this time by the peace mission. The line of information desired by the committee was the names of the persons who were employed, the salaries received, and the other allowances in the way of quarters, and so forth. That information was not available. Secretary Lansing advised me that detailed accounts were kept of every expenditure, but that the books containing them were in Paris, and that the man who kept the books was the man who would have to explain them, and that he could not get the books and the man here in time so that we could make the examination. He stated that inasmuch as he had allotted out of the appropriation of $700,000 for emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service for this fiscal year the sum of $388,000 for the expenses of this mission to negotiate peace, if we would appropriate just the amount he had allotted out of that appropriation that would carry him to about the 1st of January, and that at that time he would bring before the committee, when he would have to ask for a supplemental deficiency appropriation, all the information with regard to the expenditures by the mission. The committee has therefore followed that suggestion and has carried just the amount allotted out of that emergency appropriation for the Diplomatic Service, and will leave to future time the matter of making appropriation for this expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to remind the chairman that in the statement of the expenses as printed in the press it was stated that it was only a partial statement of the expenses.

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It was not submitted as the full statement?

Mr. GOOD. That matter was called to the attention of the Secretary of State, and the Secretary said that he will furnish the committee full and true accounting of every penny that was expended and all the information that we would want.

Mr. FESS. The partial statement made by the President August 23 is as follows:

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman can say that the information not being available the committee could not go into it at all.

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman care to say whether the report that $5,000,000 had been asked for the second trip of the President—does the gentleman care to say whether the committee took that under consideration at all?

Mr. GOOD. That was a little different from this item. That was the item asked for by the President in the sundry civil bill in the last Congress and again this year he asked for an appropriation of $5,000,000 for the national security and defense fund which could be used for this purpose, as well as a great many other purposes.

Mr. FESS. Was that allowed?

Mr. GOOD. No. That was not allowed in that Congress and has not been allowed in this.

Mr. FESS. One other question. Eight hundred thousand dollars was asked for this time——

Mr. GOOD. Eight hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. FESS. To complete the work. Is the peace commission still in session?

Mr. GOOD. Well, I think so.

Mr. FESS. What is this statement of the President, then, that it would not do to return the treaty because the peace commission would have to be reassembled?

Mr. GOOD. Well, that commission was in Paris to negotiate peace, and since the President's return it has been working on the treaty, as I understand it, with Austria-Hungary.

Mr. FESS. That is true.

Mr. GOOD. I do not know; I suppose——

Mr. FESS. They would be in session, would they not?

Mr. GOOD. Well, I do not know, but I would assume that they are there. The bookkeeper is there, and the cashier is there——

Mr. FESS. I want to say to my friend I am not trying to embarrass him, neither do I want to be pernicious——

Mr. GOOD. I understand that. I regret that I am not fully informed.

Mr. FESS. But it strikes me there seems to be a contradiction there.

Mr. GOOD. I assume that the commissioners are there; I do not know just to what extent they are in session.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I have not the floor.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if the committee inquired into the necessity for the 1,400 clerks and satellites who accompanied the President to Paris?

Mr. GOOD. I can not answer the gentleman any fuller than I have answered the gentleman from Ohio. The Secretary of State told me he would furnish the full information. The Secretary of State said that this amount would barely carry the fund along until the 1st of January. I saw, therefore, that there would be no question but what we could get the information, and the committee wanted the information. We wanted the salaries paid and to know to what extent this money was properly expended. We did not ask the Secretary to come before us, but simply have reported this out on his letter that this information will be forthcoming, and then we will have the information all together at one time.

Mr. KNUTSON. I understand that on several occasions the ladies accompanying the American party to Paris hired practically all the taxis in the town. Now, I want to know if this money came out of the expense account of the American Peace Commission.

Mr. FESS. Will the chairman put in the RECORD a statement of the expenses at this point?

Mr. GOOD. This is printed as a public document, and I am perfectly willing it should go in at this point. It is as follows:

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield? Will the gentleman furnish us the source for the statement he has just made?

Mr. KNUTSON. I was asking the chairman for information.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know; but the gentleman proceeded to state he has been informed.

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; Members of Congress who went to Paris at the time the conference was in session tried to hire taxies and found that practically all the taxies in Paris had been engaged by the American peace commission in order to furnish transportation for guests for some social function that was given. Now, I wanted to know if these taxies were hired and paid for out of the money we are squeezing from the American taxpayer. I think it is a pertinent question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What Members of Congress?

Mr. KNUTSON. I am sorry the chairman was not able to get the information from the Secretary of State. I serve notice now, as far as I am concerned, I am not going to vote for any more blanket appropriations. Give us itemized statements and let us know for what purpose moneys asked for will be used. I want to know what this administration is doing with the money that we are voting with such a free hand. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there is not the slightest objection on the part of the Secretary of State to furnish the information to which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] and other gentlemen have alluded. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] clearly stated that when he called upon the Secretary of State and told him that the committee would expect full information as to the expenditures made in Paris during the time the peace treaty was under consideration, the Secretary of State said that he would gladly furnish that information, but that it was in Paris, and that he could not now possibly give the committee the explicit information that it wished on the subject, but that he would be able to give it next December, when the next deficiency bill is under consideration.

Now, there is not any disposition on the part of the Secretary of State or any member of the administration to withhold this information. It is subject to the will of Congress and will be given to Congress just as soon as it can be made available. But this bill could not be held up and the hearings could not be prolonged until some one could come here from Paris with the information for which the committee called. Now, that is all there is to it.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. TINCHER. I notice in the partial report filed by the President that they mention rent and also damage to the building occupied by the commission while in Paris. Is the gentleman in possession of any information that he can give me on that? Has the building been damaged, or is that a Paris phrase?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have not the slightest information as to the items that go to make up these expenses, nor has anyone else here that I know of. The committee, as the gentleman from Iowa states——

Mr. TINCHER. Was there any information furnished to the committee as to the amount of rental?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There was no information furnished to the committee as to the amount of rental or any of the other items that go into this expense, so far as I know.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Hotel Crillon was rented by the commission for $35,000 a month for 10 months, or $350,000.

That includes damages, and I suppose an item was put in there that would compel the commission to put the hotel back in as good a condition as it was before they rented it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I presume the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is correct, but the committee held no hearings on this subject. I do not know what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] may have learned in his personal interview with the Secretary of State, but there were no hearings by the committee on this proposition. But there will be in December or January, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] can possess his soul in patience with the full assurance that ample and full information will be given out as soon as it is received.

Mr. KNUTSON. Suppose a subsequent investigation develops the fact that we could have refrained from making this appropriation of $388,000. How will we proceed to recover that amount?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is not an appropriation.

Mr. KNUTSON. It is a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is not in the form of a direct appropriation. It is reimbursing a fund from which the Secretary of State has paid out certain sums.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] be given two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I object.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I want to ask the chairman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to strike out the last three words.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Has the gentleman from Iowa any information as to whether the fitting up of the George Washington and the buying of automobiles and things like that are included in this?

Mr. GOOD. I can only say to the gentleman that the only information outside of the letter of Secretary Lansing is found in Senate document No. 80, which is the President's statement, and in that there is an item of $14,602.96 for the purchase of automobiles. I do not know anything more about it.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman has no information as to the fitting up of the George Washington?

Mr. GOOD. No; nothing at all. As I stated, that matter will be taken up later. The committee has communicated to the Secretary of State the fact that Congress wanted full information on the subject, and the Secretary has assured me that he has no disposition to withhold a single item of expenditure from the Congress, and that full information will be given.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. And the purpose of the appropriation is to reimburse the State Department?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; to reimburse the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the contribution of the United States toward the maintenance of the Interparliamentary Union for the Promotion of International Arbitration at Brussels, Belgium, $2,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEENERSON, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, for one week, on account of duties in connection with the Joint Commission on Postal Salaries.

INTERNATIONALIZATION OF THE WAR DEBT.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter in relation to the internationalization of the war debt.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter on the internationalization of the war debt. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

NEW YORK, September 13, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM,
Congressional Office Building, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The following incident may throw some light upon the cause of the advocacy of the projected league of nations, which is so pronounced in influential financial circles. I relate it precisely as it occurred:

Early last May there called upon me at my office a Mr. J. J. O'Neill, whose engraved card described him as London manager of the Manchester Guardian, of Manchester, England. Mr. O'Neill, who was a stranger to me, immediately introduced the subject of the league of nations and took me to task because of my opposition to that project. Upon inquiring of him why an Englishman should be in this country instructing an American in the latter's national duty, and receiving no clear answer, I asked him bluntly what was the actual purpose of his visit to the United States. He replied that he was here upon a mission connected with the internationalization of the war debt. I asked him if he meant me to understand that he was here upon the business of inducing the United States to guarantee the war debt of the nations recently at war, including that of Great Britain and that of Germany. He said that he was. I told him that he would find little sentiment in this country favorable to such a project. This seemed to surprise him. He said that I was the first American he had met who did not favor it. I then asked him whom he had seen, and he replied that upon the previous day he had seen Mr. J. P. Morgan, and that Mr. Morgan had expressed himself as being in favor of the plan.

Whether this was or was not a correct statement of Mr. Morgan's position, I have no means of knowing. But it might be valuable at this time to inquire publicly what plans, if any, are afoot to induce Europe's proposed new partner, the United States, to assume the obligations of the financially hard-hit members of the projected copartnership, who are about to open the business of pooling their troubles under the title of the league of nations.

Yours, very truly, HENRY A. WISE WOOD.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL THURSDAY AT 1.30 P. M.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until 1.30 o'clock p. m. on Thursday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until 1.30 o'clock p. m. on Thursday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FOOD-CONTROL ACT.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference without instruction.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8624, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and send the same to conference. Is there objection?

Mr. HAUGEN. Without instructions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, out of 435 Members, more than 400 are absent. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman make the point of no quorum?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes. This is an important matter, and 35 out of 435 ought not to consider it.

Mr. MONDELL. There are more than 35 present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman's pardon; there are not.

Mr. MONDELL. It is very important that this bill go to conference.

Mr. WALSH. You can not do it without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] The Chair is satisfied that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman does not want this bill to go to conference, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to orders previously made, until Thursday, September 18, 1919, at 1.30 o'clock p. m.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, September 18, 1919.

The Senate met at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, amid the glad acclaim with which we welcome home our soldier boys and seek to do honor to the great leader of our expeditionary forces we would not forget to raise our hearts in humble gratitude to Thee, the author of our freedom and the source of our power. We would be the most ungrateful of all men if we forgot the hand that has blessed us and the heart that has loved us through all the years, and the arm that has defended and saved us.

We pray Thy blessing upon our returning soldiers, that as they enter into the walks of life they may carry with them the same devotion to duty, the same high idealism that inspired them on the battle field, and that they may each have the guidance and blessing of the God of our fathers. We pray that our Nation, born anew out of the conflict of nations, may take its place in the leadership of those who love peace and justice and God. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present resolutions adopted by U. S. S. Tampa Post, No. 5, American Legion, of Tampa, Fla., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution by U. S. S. Tampa Post, No. 5, American Legion, Tampa, Fla.

Whereas various measures have been introduced in the Congress of the United States for the aid of the discharged soldier, sailor, and marine, veterans of the late war; and

Whereas among such measures is H. R. 487, referred to as the Mondell bill, otherwise the national soldier settlement act; and

Whereas such a measure will not benefit all soldiers, sailors, and marines, and even under the most favorable circumstances, it is limited to approximately 80,000 out of 4,800,000; and

Whereas under the terms of said bill an initial capital of not less than $1,200 is required of each soldier, sailor, and marine; and

Whereas said bill is not confined to the public lands of the United States but provides for "projects" to be purchased in the several States, thus opening the way for fraud, reckless expenditures of public funds, and real estate grafting of all natures and kinds; and

Whereas a certain measure has been introduced in the Congress of the United States providing for loans for the purpose of securing to the discharged soldier, sailor, and marine, veterans of the late war, city or country homes, and in the sum of from $1,000 to $5,000 at 4 per cent interest and payable over 40 years of time; and

Whereas this in the judgment of this post of the American Legion is the fairest and most equitable of all such measures, both to the soldier and to the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved by U. S. S. Tampa Post, No. 5, American Legion:

First. That we condemn and oppose H. R. 487, known as the national soldier settlement act.

Second. That we favor and acclaim that measure providing loans to the discharged soldier, sailor, and marine, veterans of the late war, whereby they will be loaned a sum of from $1,000 to $5,000 at 4 per cent interest, covering a period of 40 years time and for the purpose of providing a home either in the city or country.

Third. That this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this post.

Fourth. That a copy of these resolutions under the seal of this post be mailed to Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, Senator PARK TRAMMELL, Congressmen H. J. DRANE, W. J. SEARS, FRANK CLARK, and J. H. SMITHWICK, who are requested to exert every effort to defeat the said national soldier settlement act, and, on the other hand, to support and secure the passage of that measure providing for the loan to the discharged soldier, sailor, and marine, veterans of the late war, of the sum of $1,000 to $5,000 at 4 per cent interest covering a period of 40 years in time, and to secure for the soldier, sailor, and marine a home either in the city or country.

Fifth. That our Senators and Congressmen aforesaid be and they are hereby requested to acknowledge receipt of these resolutions and to indicate their intentions in this matter.

Sixth. That copies of these resolutions be printed and mailed to all adjoining posts of the American Legion, requesting and inviting similar action on their part.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. McLEAN. As in executive session, I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Banking and Currency the nomination of Henry A. Moehlenpoh, of Clinton, Wis., to be a member of the Federal Reserve Board, to fill out the unexpired term of Frederick A. Delano, resigned.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. President, I present a communication from A. H. Vandenberg, editor and publisher of the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Herald, inclosing clippings from the Sunday edition of the Herald covering the poll of Grand Rapids soldiers and sailors showing overwhelming sentiment that league of nations be made safe for the United States. I ask that the communication and accompanying editorials be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"The GRAND RAPIDS HERALD,
"September 14, 1919.

"Hon. TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I inclose herewith complete clippings from the Sunday Herald covering the poll concerning which I wired you in advance. You are at liberty to make whatever use you please of this information.

"With warm personal regards and best wishes, I am
"Cordially and faithfully, yours,
"A. H. VANDENBERG, Editor."

"SERVICE MEN STRONG IN DEMAND FOR RESERVATIONS—POLL OF GRAND RAPIDS SOLDIERS AND SAILORS SHOWS OVERWHELMING CHALLENGE THAT LEAGUE BE MADE SAFE FOR UNITED STATES—VOTE HEAVY AGAINST EXTREMISTS.

"[By A. H. Vandenberg, the editor of the Herald.]

"In order to seek out, if possible, and determine the real attitude of service men in the contemporary league-of-nations crisis the Herald went this week to a representative coterie of service men themselves.

"Three hundred local soldiers and sailors fresh from the Army and the Navy were asked for frank expression of opinion. Those who participated in the ballot are described in detail later. Suffice it to say, by way of introduction, that it is surely fair to deem them completely representative of the Army's and the Navy's thought.

"Out of the number polled definite expression was secured from 230, and this, in concrete epitome, is what their verdict says:

"Favoring unlimited ratification	21
"Favoring complete rejection	13
"Favoring reservations	196

"A more completely overwhelming verdict could not possibly be imagined. It is no longer necessary for any advocate to 'guess' at the sort of 'peace' that is wanted by the men who made 'peace' possible. By a vote of 209 to 21—ten to one—they are opposed to the program for which President Wilson contends in his transcontinental sweep—because all those favoring complete rejection must be joined with the reservationists in such an accounting.

"OPPOSE SENATE EXTREMISTS.

"By an equally overwhelming majority they are opposed to such few Senate extremists as would kick over the whole undertaking—although definite figures on this score are impossible, because many declared that they would stand against the whole treaty rather than accept it without reservations. The program that they favor by such preponderance that the totals are positively commanding is a program of effective reservations to make the league safe for the United States.

"Is not this a signboard to the feelings of our whole people? Is not this division typical in almost every walk of life? And is it not the inevitable eventual outcome? If it is, since the statesmen at these opposite extremes pretend such solicitude for popular desires, why should not both extremes give way—the President and his apostles at one end and wholly hostile Senators at the other—and bring this favorable composition now instead of a month from now? The Senators are ready. That is known to all who analyze the rolls. The situation waits upon the President. The country does not want him to have his whole way. He can not get his whole way. His tour is not affecting conditions one single bit, as evidenced by constant additions to the ranks of reservationists in the Senate itself.

"WHY NOT NOW.

"The voice of ex-service men should be the final pointer to the final goal. And—as a well-known advertiser says—'if eventually, why not now?'

"In making the lists of men for the purposes of this poll the Herald went primarily to the local records of the American Legion. The membership of the local post composes substantially the bulk of the lists that were used. Upon these lists were men from every branch of service and of every rank from private up to major. In connection with this report is printed a list of the names of such of these men as attached their signatures to their votes for publication. The names thus printed are typical of the entire list that was used and that responded.

"More than half of the cards were marked and returned without signature for publication. But the names that we are permitted to present eloquently tell the whole story of the whole poll.

"RESERVATIONS AS OUTLINED.

"The 'reservations' for which this overwhelming majority voted were detailed in the Herald's letter as follows:

"First. Proclamation that we shall never permit alien jurisdiction over our immigration and tariff laws.

"Second. Proclamation that we shall never allow the 'league' covenant to be interpreted as limiting our 'Monroe doctrine' authority in any respect.

"Third. Proclamation that we recognize no moral obligation to follow 'league' leadership into future foreign wars, except as our own American Congress, by free and untrammeled decision, shall vote us into these wars under the authority provided in the Constitution of the United States.

"Fourth. Proclamation that we shall always construe our rights of withdrawal from the 'league' as being absolute and unhampered by 'league' veto.

"In a few instances, but in a few only, the service men amended this schedule. In a very considerable number of instances they indicated that while satisfied with reservations, they would be well pleased to have the Senate go still further and make amendments. And in a number of other cases they volunteered the information that if adequate reservations are not secured they favor complete rejection rather than complete ratification.

"HOW SERVICE MEN VOTED IN HERALD LEAGUE POLL.

"FOR RESERVATIONS.

"SOLDIERS AND THE LEAGUE."

[By A. H. Vandenberg, the editor of the Herald.]

(Editor's note—The Herald from day to day is analyzing President Wilson's speeches from the standpoint of that American majority which believes the treaty of peace should be ratified, but only with effective American reservations which shall make the proposed "league of nations" safe for the United States.—No. 10.)

"Throughout President Wilson's intemperate appeal against 'contemptible quitters' (who ought to be hung on a high 'gibbet' because in their 'selfish passion' or their 'ignorance' or their 'ostrich foolishness' in refusing sled-length consent to Mr. Wilson's personal conception of what a 'league of nations' ought to be) runs a constant inference that unless we do this exact thing exactly as he commands, we shall disappoint the American soldier and repudiate the pledge we gave him when we sent him into a war 'to end all war.' The President has rung the changes on this subtle sentimentality. He has pretended to possess an imaginary mandate from our fighting sons—a mandate to impose this unlimited 'league' upon us as being the thing for which we went to war and for which our Armies fought. He has rhetorically aligned opponents to his will—'reservationists' and all—against the men who joined the colors.

"The Herald has long believed that this pretense is unwarranted; that the American soldier went to war 'in defense of our rights as a free people' (the President's own words in 1917), and not primarily for some prospective experiment in international contracts; that he feels no greater debt to the world than toward his own American posterity; that he has neither interest nor intention to reenlist for automatic participation in all the future embroilments of all the world; that he is intensely partisan to a pure and unadulterated (and even 'selfish,' if you please) Americanism; and that while he favors any experiment which holds any peace hopes for the future (as the 'league' unquestionably does) he desires no adventure in which such an experiment does not guarantee complete protection to vital American essentials (as the 'league'—without reservations—does not).

"Certainly the men who fought to win this peace have an inalienable right of consultation in determining what the fruits of that peace shall be. But their posture should not be a matter of speculation—fitted artificially to the needs of advocates upon one side or the other. Their indorsement should not be sacrosanctly claimed to suit an orator's expedient convenience. If the President's proposals, in these regards, are justified, then it would be a powerful argument in favor of his swallow-whole idea. But if they are not justified, as the Herald has believed, then their reiteration smacks of sham and sacrilege.

"To settle the contention we have gone straight to the service men themselves. We have trusted to no uncertain 'voices in the air.' They spoke for themselves beyond the oceans. They can speak for themselves back here at home.

"Elsewhere in this morning's Sunday Herald we print a poll. It is no ordinary 'straw ballot.' It was addressed to 300 ex-service men in Grand Rapids—officers and privates, majors, captains, lieutenants, sergeants, corporals—men who fought upon the land, men who swept the seas. The lists came largely from the headquarters of the American Legion. The names were taken without regard to any ulterior considerations. We wanted to know the mind of the defenders. And we think we have found out.

"Surely this list—typified by its published names—can be deemed representative of the group whose bulk opinion we have sought. We would cheerfully have taken all the ex-service men in town if their names and addresses had been available. But can there be much doubt that this cross-section tells the story?

"Was ever a conclusion driven home with keener steel?

"Some of the ex-service men—a very few—favor the Nation's complete acquiescence in the unlimited 'league' responsibilities which were fashioned for us behind the closed doors of the secret cabinet at Versailles. All honor to them for the good conscience of their opinions. We have no disposition to reciprocate the malignant epithets which are showered upon his opposition by the great Executive whom Mr. Henry Ford has frankly nominated for 'President of the world.'

"Some few more—still a minority—favor the Nation's complete rejection of an experiment which they evidently deem desperately inimical to the perpetuated American liberties for which they gave so freely of themselves when the President called us 'to a defense of our rights as a free people.' All honor to them, too, for their opinions. Surely those who were ready for the valley of the shadow, in the national defense, have completest right to speak their honest minds without let or hindrance—and, particularly, without earning harsh invitation to adorn a 'gibbet.'

"But a vast, preponderating majority speaks up for that program to which a majority of the Senate is committed; speaks up for candid, courageous, effective American reservations which shall make the 'league' safe for the United States.

"Here is a real mandate, if the soldier will and the sailor wish are to be consulted. So far as President Wilson and his obdurate demand for sled-length obeisance to his unlimited 'league' charts are concerned, this voice of the Army and the Navy denies Mr. Wilson's gratuitous assumption that this exact thing which he would force upon the country and the Senate is the net result for which the Army and the Navy fought. It denies—overwhelmingly—that fears lest fracture happen to 'the heart of the world' is paramount in the American martial breast. It denies that we dare not look to our own American concerns when negotiating a new, experimental alliance with nervous nations beyond the seas. And if these men be 'contemptible quitters,' we are happy to join them in their obloquy.

"When they speak up for the program of reservations which the Herald submitted to them—and which the Herald has many times submitted to its readers—they are 'quitters' only in that they 'quit' internationalism at the point (1) where it might rob us of our right to rule our own immigration standards and establish our own tariffs; (2) where it might permit Europe and Asia a voice in the administration of our time-honored Monroe doctrine (which Mr. Wilson himself once said 'must always be maintained upon American responsibility' alone); (3) where it might allow the Old World a strategic veto upon our free and untrammeled right of withdrawal from the 'league' if secession should ever prove ultimately essential to our independent self-determination; (4) where it might put us under 'an absolutely compelling moral obligation'—the President's own words—to follow an alien-controlled 'league' authority into foreign wars which are none of our immediate concern and in which we would be disinclined to participate. To these extents—and these only—they are 'quitters.' In such a cause, an honorable distinction!

"The trouble with presidential logic, on this latest tour, is that Mr. Wilson bundles his whole opposition into one condemned sect. In delivering his dubious compliments he does not differentiate between those who would reject his whole treaty undertaking and those who would take it with necessary limitations—reservations—preservations. Therefore his opposition, thus bulked by the President himself, must be considered as a whole; and as a whole, so far as this poll reflects the opinion of ex-service men, it flatly challenges the 'league' program for which Mr. Wilson speaks in his personal crusade.

"Fair analysis of this symposium, of course, likewise compels a verdict against extremists at the other end of the equation—those Senators who insist upon textual amendments to the treaty text—even as it compels a verdict against the President at his end of the line. This would be worthy of equal emphasis if there was reasonable prospect that complete defeatists or textual amendments could ever muster a senatorial majority. But this is out of the question. The issue—when we consult realities—is reservations. And the 'mandate' from ex-service men speaks up in thunders on their behalf. It is the view the Herald has preached for months. For the sake of its possible influence upon the world for good and peace, we must ratify the treaty with its covenant; for the sake of avoiding the delays attendant upon reopened Versailles negotiations, we must not attempt textual amendments, if America can be adequately protected otherwise; but for the sake of perpetuated American constitutional independence, we must attach reservations to our signature so that American safety is left neither to chance nor to an unshared idealism.

"When Mr. Wilson accepts this view and joins in this posture, as he ultimately will, the war for peace will be over. Why does he not get the Rubicon behind him? If he waits too long before taking this much of a 'league' victory, does not the trend of the times warn that he may fail of any 'victory' at all?

"'An Irishman went into one of those antiquated institutions known as a saloon. He saw two men fighting in the corner. He went to the bartender and said: "Is this a private fight or can anybody get in?" * * * In the true Irish spirit we are abolishing private fighting and making a law of mankind that it is everybody's business and everybody can get in, consequently there will be no attempts at private fighting.'

"This verbatim quotation is one authority's measure of 'the league of nations' as it stands. Like the belligerent who thirsted for a chance to mix in a saloon brawl, America is on the threshold of an opportunity to make 'fighting' 'everybody's business' so that 'everybody can get in.'

"Does not that sound like the exaggerated—'jaundiced' would be the presidential adjective—argument of some extremist seeking recklessly to ridicule the 'league' idea? In the name of 'peace' we propose to make fighting 'everybody's business'! Like a saloon brawler, we contemplate answer to an itching appetite to break into other people's wars! Is that, really, a fair estimate of the contract we are asked to sign as humbly and as unquestioningly as the Germans signed in the Hall of Mirrors at Versailles? Does it not go a bit too far in its indictment?

"Listen, reader! That quotation is not from one of the 'contemptible quitters' bent upon 'breaking the heart of the world.' It is not from rejectionists like JOHNSON and BORAH, nor from reservationists like SPENCER and MCCUMBER. It is not even from a still more friendly critic. It is a verbatim quotation from the St. Paul speech of the author of the covenant itself. It is President Wilson speaking in favor of unlimited 'league' acceptance! He himself gives us the simile; himself likens our prospective posture to the Irishman aching for a fight!

"Could there be a more profound demonstration that language is frequently susceptible of being read two diametrically opposite ways? What the President means, of course, is that the Irishman will prove to be a peacemaker—thanks to the retardent effect of his prospective participation in hostilities. But the perfectly logical and time-honored 'interpretation' of that ancient story which men have put upon it for years is that the Irishman hungers for his share of gore. In other words, the President needs to attach an effective 'reservation' to his malapropos example in order to make it 'safe' for the purposes he seeks to accomplish. And with such a 'reservation' it is entirely safe.

"So with 'the covenant.' It can be read safely or unsafely for the United States—depending upon the temper of the parliament of nations we are about to erect. The sole purpose of reservationists is to effectively guarantee that it must always be read safely so far as concerns America. We refuse to be the 'Irishman' in pursuit of trouble. Too frequently that 'Irishman' lands in the hospital with damaged dignity or in jail with curtailed freedom."

JOINT MEETING—WELCOME TO GEN. PERSHING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour having arrived for the joint meeting of the two Houses, the Sergeant at Arms will conduct the Senate to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The Senate, preceded by the Sergeant at Arms and the Assistant Doorkeeper, and by the President pro tempore and the Assistant Secretary, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

At 2 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m. the Senate returned to its Chamber, and the President pro tempore resumed the chair.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 19, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, September 18, 1919.

The House met at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

With gratitude welling up in our hearts, Father in heaven, for the rich qualities resident in the soul of man, which in times of stress and great danger make him a hero and bring the appreciative to their knees in adoration and praise—illustrated by the thousands who came from their homes with glad acclaim for the brave men who marched before them, bringing some of their wounded with them, leaving their dead on the bloody fields of France, where they won a victory for democracy, justice, liberty for all men. A sight long to be remembered by those who witnessed it and will forever gild the pages of history.

And now the Congress of the United States of America will do itself honor in a joint session of thanksgiving and praise to the great general who planned the battles and led on to victory. All hail to Gen. John J. Pershing! May he live long and enjoy the prestige which he won for himself and the American soldier; and longer yet, his deeds and their valor, inspire our freeborn sons with patriot fire. In the name of the world's greatest Hero, our Lord and Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, September 16, was read and approved.

SEATS FOR THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he is informed that the first three rows of seats will be required for the Senate to-day, and therefore he hopes that Members will leave those rows unoccupied.

PRESENTATION OF FLAG.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the attention of Members has undoubtedly been called to the very beautiful new banner suspended back of the Speaker's desk. [Applause.] Relative to that banner I desire to ask for the reading of a letter from Mrs. George Thacher Guernsey, president general of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 19, 1919.

To the UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: It having come to the knowledge of the president general of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution that an American flag presented to the United States House of Representatives some years ago by one of the chapters of the society has become so soiled and worn as to be unsightly the matter was brought to the attention of the board of management of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution by the president general, and by unanimous consent of the board it was voted that a new flag be given by the national society to the House of Representatives. It is with great pleasure, therefore, that the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution presents to the United States House of Representatives a flag to be hung in its august Chamber. May this symbol of freedom inspire every Member of the House of Representatives.

Very sincerely,

SARAH E. GUERNSEY,
(MRS. GEORGE THACHER GUERNSEY),
President General National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

[Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit a resolution formally accepting the beautiful flag which has been thus gracefully presented by the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution through their president general and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming offers a resolution and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. The Clerk will report it.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives accepts gratefully the flag of the United States presented by the National Society Daughters of the American Revolution, and will cause it to be displayed within the Hall of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker, so that we may have a rising vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 261, noes none.

Accordingly the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House have long been inspired by the beautiful banner presented to the House years ago by the Daughters of the American Revolution, which is displaced by the new banner now occupying space back of the Speaker's chair. In order that the old banner which has so long hung in glory and honor in this Hall may be appropriately preserved, I offer the following preamble and resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the flag which was displayed in the Hall of the House of Representatives from the year 1901 until displaced by the flag presented to the House by the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and this day accepted by the House, a period of time covering the first 19 years of the twentieth century, during which the House of Representatives participated in the events preliminary to and in the enactment of legislation for the prosecution of the war with the Imperial German Government and with the Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, and during which time also many other historic and important acts originated, were perfected, or consummated herein: Therefore be it

Resolved, That because of the association of said flag with the legislative history of the United States during the period aforesaid, and in token of the House's appreciation of the patriotism of the members of said society and of the women of the United States, the Clerk of the House of Representatitves is hereby authorized and directed to deliver said flag to the board of management of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, to be displayed and carefully preserved in the archives of said society, together with a copy of this preamble and resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I move the adoption of the resolution, Mr. Speaker.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE SIGNING OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, on to-morrow our colleague from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has 40 minutes to address the House on the subject of the adoption of the Federal Constitution. My colleague from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] represents a district that sent some notable historic figures to that convention, including Gen. Washington, and also some very notable historic figures to the Virginia convention which ratified the Federal Constitution. I ask unanimous consent that in that connection and on that subject matter he may have 20 minutes in which to address the House, immediately following the address of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. MOORE of Virginia] may address the House for 20 minutes to-morrow, immediately following the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. Is there objection?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia that the deficiency bill is pending, and we expect to take it up this afternoon. We can not finish the bill to-day. Already the consideration of it has been very much protracted. I do not think a bill of that importance should be set aside for speeches of any kind, and unless there is some very good reason why these exercises should go on, I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Let me say to my friend from Iowa that his colleague [Mr. TOWNER] has already obtained the time referred to for to-morrow, and this request is for a bare 20 minutes to follow that address. To-morrow will be quite a historic occasion, and as I have pointed out, the gentleman on whose behalf I prefer the request represents a district of Virginia that sent more notable historic figures to the convention that ratified the Federal Constitution, as well as to the convention which framed it, than any other district of my State. My colleague from Virginia has not occupied much of the time of the House; and while I am fully in accord with the idea of hastening the consideration of the deficiency bill, the 20 minutes asked on his behalf will not materially delay the passage of that measure. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. I am sure we will all be very glad to hear the gentleman, but the consideration of the deficiency bill had to await the washing of dirty linen by the Department of Labor and the American Federation of Labor for about three hours the other day, and when we begin to set aside the regular proceedings for speeches there is no telling where it will end. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to object.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if we meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock, this will merely take up the hour before 12 o'clock, the regular hour of meeting, and the gentleman from Iowa will have 40 minutes and the gentleman from Virginia 20 minutes. So the gentleman [Mr. GOOD] will be able to come in with his bill at 12 o'clock, the same as if we met at the regular time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] will withhold his objection for a moment, I shall make a request for unanimous consent that the House meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that following the address of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] may address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

GEN. JOHN J. PERSHING—JOINT SESSION OF SENATE AND HOUSE.

At 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m. the Doorkeeper, Bert W. Kennedy, announced the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Members of the United States Senate.

The Members of the House rose.

The Senate, preceded by the President pro tempore and by the Assistant Secretary (Henry M. Rose) and Sergeant at Arms (David S. Barry), entered the Chamber.

The President pro tempore took the chair at the right of the Speaker and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

At 2 o'clock p. m. the Doorkeeper announced the General of the Armies of the United States and the members of his staff.

Gen. John J. Pershing, escorted by the members of his staff, entered the Hall of the House amid prolonged applause, and they occupied the seats assigned to them.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and guests, the committee on arrangements has prepared a program of exercises for this occasion, and, first, we will listen to an address of welcome, in the absence of the Vice President of the United States, by the President pro tempore of the Senate, Senator CUMMINS, of Iowa. [Applause.]

Senator CUMMINS. Gen. Pershing, it is my high privilege to extend to you the sincere and cordial greeting of the Senate of the United States. The message that I have the honor to bear is not a greeting alone but an earnest welcome and a hearty congratulation upon your safe, victorious return to your native land. [Applause.] Nor is it a welcome only, for it is full of deep appreciation of the splendid task you have so wonderfully and worthily accomplished. You were called upon to assume the immeasurable responsibility of commanding the greatest body of soldiers who ever marched under the American flag, and you led this superb, invincible host of our brightest, best, and bravest boys to the very summit of military fame and glory. [Applause.]

While our tears are falling and our hearts are breaking as we solemnly remember the tens of thousands who sailed away with spirit so resolute, courage so perfect, and who will return never more until God calls all of us on His judgment day, we receive with unbounded joy and undying gratitude those who have passed unharmed through the perils of the cruelest war in the history of the world.

Your entrance into France, followed by an army which exceeded in numbers and surpassed in daring the most enthusiastic prophecies, was the most impressive spectacle in all the annals of warfare, for America hastened to the aid of that stricken but defiant country in a way and to a degree never before witnessed, and which has no parallel in the record of nations in this or any other age. A little more than a year later, with a purpose which never faltered and a skill which never failed, the United States had accomplished its mission, and when the day of the armistice dawned it had won the admiration and held the confidence, esteem, and affection of every country of the earth whose people loved justice, revered liberty, and honored manhood. [Applause.] Upon that day the name and fame of the American soldier and the Nation of his allegiance had risen to the highest point ever attained in the sacred cause of humanity.

May the Ruler of the universe, the Divine Master, help us to maintain in all the stormy years to come the respect and faith which you and your gallant army so magnificently won for America and her beloved institutions. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The committee on arrangements thought it was fitting that, after the eloquent periods of the Presiding Officer of the Senate, which certainly need no supplement, there should be a few plain and homely words on behalf of the Representatives of the people. [Applause and laughter.] Tradition relates that when one of the marshals of Louis XIV was about to leave Paris for a campaign he went to take farewell of his sovereign, and the well-disposed monarch said to him, "Go and fight my battles, and I will protect you against your enemies at home," to which the blunt warrior responded, "I would prefer, sire, that you should protect me from my friends. I can protect myself against my enemies." So I wonder if our distinguished guest to-day, under the constant fire of receptions and reviews and banquets and compliments to which he is exposed, does not sometimes feel like asking to be protected from his friends. [Laughter.] He certainly needs no protection against his enemies, for in this country he has none. [Applause.]

Human nature loves to personify its ideals. It loves a hero and hero worship. And so we all rejoice to-day to see personified in the commanding general the gallantry, the high purpose, the unconquerable determination of our crusading Army. [Applause.] Those boys went out from loving homes all over the land. They were our bravest and best. It is the duty and the glory of youth to fight the battles of their generation. To those who fell we render tearful homage. To those who return maimed and crippled we owe tender care and support. But for the great Army which has come back, disciplined in body and in character, having bravely offered the supremest sacrifice, which was found unnecessary, stored with recollections and experiences and friendships which will enrich their whole lives and which nothing could buy from them—for them I have indeed gratitude and admiration. But my strongest emotion is envy.

[Applause.] They will be our heroes. In all the relations of life, in business, in politics, in love, they will be a favored class. None can compete with them except by their own misbehavior. And in you, sir, their commanding general, we like to see typified the spirit of that noble Army—the courage, the self-reliance, the endurance, the chivalrous daring which made them invincible. As their fit representative, sir, we, Representatives of the people, welcome you home. [Applause.]

But I would not intimate that our welcome is entirely impersonal. Of the details of your generalship and strategy we are not now qualified to judge. In due time that will be adjudicated by history. But we do know that you were gloriously successful. [Applause.] We know, too, that you had abundant opportunity for mistakes. You were surrounded by pitfalls. Far from your own Government, in a foreign land, you had to rely upon yourself. Even in what you said you must be prudent, for you must not depreciate your allies while vindicating your own country.

There was every chance for errors. But, sir, if you made them, either in policy or in statement, we have not heard of them. [Applause.] I have wondered whether if there had not been at the head of our forces such a strong American character we would have had a truly American Army or a truly American offensive. [Applause.] We only know that with you, sir, we had both. [Applause.] You have seemed to us not only a successful general bending all his great powers without favor and without leniency to the one stern purpose of victory, but you have also seemed a wise, discreet, restrained, farsighted man. And, sir, I may add that to those of us who know you it is refreshing but not surprising to find that, after all the supreme power, the high station, the lordly associates, and the unstinted compliments to which you have become accustomed, you have developed neither arrogance nor affectation, but that you have come back as you went away—modest, straightforward, unspoiled. [Applause.] It was of such men as you that Burns wrote:

The rank is but the guinea's stamp;
The man's the gowd for a' that,
For a' that and a' that,
His dignities and a' that,
The pith of sense and pride of worth
Are higher ranks than a' that.

And as we rejoiced to give you the rank to which your extraordinary service entitled you, we rejoice still more in the sterling character which that rank decorates. [Applause.]

Congress recently passed a resolution tendering its thanks to Gen. Pershing, and the intent and purpose of that resolution will now be more fully expressed by ex-Speaker CLARK, from the general's home State of Missouri. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Gen. Pershing, and ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Speaker GILLETT failed to state one great secret in enumerating what the soldiers were going to be and to do in the time to come, and that is that in a very few years from now they will occupy both the House and the Senate. [Laughter.] Gen. Pershing, since you landed in New York on September the 8th you must have been surfeited with speeches. Orators to the left of you, orators to the right of you, orators in front of you, volleyed and thundered. This is the greatest oratorical nation on the face of the earth, and the House and Senate are two representative bodies in character of American oratory, and they contribute their linguistic mite to the welcome extended to you from the Atlantic to the Pacific. [Laughter and applause.]

"Grim-visaged war hath smoothed his wrinkled front," and peace, with healing in her wing, like a gentle spirit, now is brooding over a blood-drenched and storm-rocked world, God be thanked! And you, Gen. Pershing, were a master workman in this wondrous and blessed transformation—a consummation so devoutly wished by all peoples, kindreds, and tongues.

For reasons which the world knows by heart President Wilson recommended war. The Congress voted war. From all our able officers you were selected as commander of our Armies overseas. The administration, the Congress, and the whole American people did everything within their power to hold up your hands and to furnish you and the brave men under you everything possible to comfort and to cheer. Your countrymen and countrywomen watched your conduct with bated breath and with implicit faith. While all the other nations changed commanders, we never did. Both you and the American people were constant as the northern star. [Applause.]

I am happy in the belief that the typical American rises equal to any emergency in which he finds himself placed. A great opportunity came to you which you seized with resolute hand and unquailing spirit and wrote your name on the scanty list of the world's great captains. That your high career both satisfied and gratified the American people is amply attested by your splendid continent-wide welcome home—a welcome not from the lips only but hot from the great, proud, pulsing heart of the mightiest Nation in all the hoary registers of time. No welcome to any other of our fellow citizens returning to America from foreign strands is comparable to yours except that to Gen. Grant after his trip around the world and that to Admiral Dewey after his victory at Manila Bay and that to President Wilson fresh from his arduous labors at Paris—Grant, Dewey, Wilson, Pershing—most assuredly a famous quartet of American worthies. Their deeds will be celebrated in story and chanted in song till the sun grows cold. [Applause.]

What we say here will be little heeded, but the memory of what you and your gallant men did over there will be cherished forever as part of the precious treasures of the mighty Republic.

You and your men did not fight to add to the area or wealth of our beloved country, but to uphold the principles of right and truth and justice. Our soldiers who died in the war did not die in vain, but to make men free. As long as the Republic endures—which we all hope will be to the last syllable of recorded time—their graves in France will be sacred shrines. [Applause.]

Their spirits wrap the dusky mountain,
Their memories sparkle o'er the fountain;
The meanest rill, the mightiest river,
Rolls mingling with their fame forever.

General, you commanded more men than any other American soldier ever commanded—more, we hope, than any other American will ever command; for every sane and patriotic American most fervently hopes that our country, so favored by Heaven in all that makes for true manhood and womanhood, will never be involved in another war. [Applause.]

Your singular fortune has given you command of troops on three continents—America, Asia, and Europe. In the World War your vast army not only carried America's honor upon their bayonets but complete victory for the country and the cause for which they fought and for which thousands died and more thousands bled.

By universal acclaim your conduct was superb and makes 110,000,000 of Americans proud to claim you as our countryman.

Of all your actions the one for which we are most profoundly grateful and for which we love you best was that you strongly and triumphantly insisted that you and your men would fight only as an American Army and not merely as replacement troops for British, French, Italians, or Belgians. [Applause.] That feat was the acid test of your robust Americanism. It caused all our hearts to swell with ineffable pride and entitled you to our eternal gratitude.

It has been said that "duty" is the sublimest word in our vernacular. A most important duty—in very truth, an awful duty—was assigned to you and you discharged it so as to fill the world with your renown and to raise the fame of American valor to the highest point among the nations of the world even unto the ends of the earth.

Extraordinary military rank should be conferred only for extraordinary services in the field. In appreciation of your services the Congress, voicing the sentiments of the American people, have conferred on you in perpetuity the extraordinary rank of full general—the highest military honor within our power to bestow, and in honoring you we feel that we are honoring ourselves. Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Pershing—the only four permanent full generals we have ever had.

In addition to the permanent generalship, the Congress has tendered you individually and to your officers and men en masse the thanks of the American people and of the Congress of the United States—a rare honor in itself conferred in our entire history on only a very few of our distinguished citizens for extraordinary services to the Republic. A vote of thanks by name to a man confers upon him free access to the floor of the House and Senate—a privilege which we hope you will frequently exercise to our delight.

The resolution of thanks is in these words:

The thanks of the American people and of the Congress of the United States are due, and are hereby tendered, to Gen. John J. Pershing for his highly distinguished services as commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, and to the officers and men under his command of their unwavering duty and valor throughout the war.

The chief reason why the committee of arrangements appointed me for this most pleasant function is the fact that you are not only a great American but also the foremost living Missourian than which there is no finer type of American, while I happen to be the dean of the Missouri delegation in Congress. I am proud and happy to present you as "Exhibit A," showing forth to the world what sort of men Missouri grows when in her most prodigal of moods—

Tall men, sun crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking.

[Loud applause.]

Gen. Pershing rose, and was greeted by loud and prolonged applause on the floor and in the galleries, the Members rising.

Gen. PERSHING. Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the Congress, I am deeply sensible of the privilege of appearing before you as a representative of the American Expeditionary Forces, and am filled with emotion at the sentiments that have just been expressed. This honor affords me profound gratitude as a recognition of the achievements of our splendid Army. [Applause.] In receiving at your hands an expression of the approval of our people I am richly rewarded. [Applause.]

A final report of the organization and the operations of our Armies will be made to the Secretary of War. The manner in which this great force was developed into an instrumentality for victory is well known to you. The burdens that fell to the lot of our soldiers have been heavy, and the way beset by many obstacles, but faith in the righteousness of our cause and trust in Almighty God have given us courage and inspiration. [Loud applause.]

The trials of battle demanded Spartan endurance and utmost self-sacrifice. Never have men faced a more difficult task nor borne greater hardship, and never have troops shown a finer spirit of willingness or more resolute purpose. [Applause.]

The might of America lay not only in her numbers and her wealth but also in the spirit of the people and their determination to succeed at whatever cost. [Applause.] While every man who went to France courageously did his part, behind him were millions of others eager to follow, all supported by a loyal people who deprived themselves to sustain our Armies and to succour our Allies.

Whether billeted in French, Belgian, or Italian villages, or in the camps of England, our young men have left behind them a standard of frankness, of integrity, of gentleness, and of helpfulness, which will give the other nations of the world a firmer belief in the sincerity of our motives. [Applause.]

The benefits flowing from the experience of our soldiers will be broadly felt. They have returned in the full vigor of their manhood, strong and clean. [Applause.] In the community of effort, men from all walks of life have learned to know and to appreciate each other. Through their patriotism, discipline, and association they have become virile, confident, and broadminded. Rich in the consciousness of honorable public service, they will bring into the life of our country a deeper love for our institutions and a more intelligent devotion to the duties of citizenship. [Applause.]

To you, gentlemen of the Congress, we owe the existence and the maintenance of our Armies in the field. With a clear conception of the magnitude of the struggle you adopted the draft as the surest means of utilizing our man power. You promptly enacted wise laws to develop and apply our resources to the best effect. You appropriated the fabulous sums required for military purposes. Many of your Members visited our armies in the field and cheered us by their interest and sympathy. You made possible the organization and the operations by which victory was achieved. [Applause.]

Throughout the war the President reposed in me his full confidence, and his unfailing support simplified my task. [Applause.] The Secretary of War made repeated visits to the front, and I am deeply grateful for his wise counsel. [Applause.] Under him the various staffs, bureaus, and departments, with all their personnel, are deserving of especial acknowledgment for the ability with which their problems were met. [Applause.] The officers and soldiers who served at home are entitled to their full share in the victory. [Applause.] There existed a unity of purpose between our Government in all of its branches and the command of the troops in the field that materially hastened the end.

Our Navy performed a brilliant part in transporting troops and supplies and in maintaining our sea communications. [Applause.] The Army was convoyed across the seas with the maximum of safety and comfort and with incredibly small loss. [Applause.] In this arduous service the generous assistance of the seamen of Great Britain deserves our lasting appreciation. [Applause.]

A special tribute is due to those benevolent men and women who ministered to the needs of our soldiers at home and abroad. [Applause.] The welfare societies, maintained by a generous public, gave us invaluable aid. In our hospitals the surgeons and nurses, both permanent and temporary, served with a skill and fidelity that will ever be worthy of our grateful remembrance. [Applause.]

Business and professional men abandoned their private interests and gave their service to the country. Devoted men, women, and even children, often in obscure positions, zealously labored to increase the output of ships, munitions, war material, and food supplies, while the press and the pulpit stimulated patriotic enthusiasm. [Applause.]

Our admiration goes out to our war-worn Allies, whose tenacity after three years of conflict made possible the effectiveness of our effort. [Applause.] Through their loyal support and hearty cooperation a genuine spirit of comradeship sprang up among us which should firmly unite the peoples as it did their armies. [Applause.]

The cheerfulness and fortitude of our wounded were an inspiration and a stimulus to their comrades. [Applause.] Those who are disabled should become the affectionate charge of our people, whose care they have so richly earned. [Prolonged applause.] Let us in sympathy remember the widows and the mothers who to-day mourn the loss of their husbands and sons. [Applause.]

Our hearts are filled with reverence and love for our triumphant dead. Buried in hallowed ground which their courage redeemed, their graves are sacred shrines that the Nation will not fail to honor. [Applause.]

The glorious record made in the fight for our treasured ideals will be a precious heritage to posterity. It has welded together our people and given them a deeper sense of nationality. The solidity of the Republic and its institutions in the test of a world war should fill with pride every man and woman living under its flag. The great achievements, the high ideals, the sacrifices of our Army and our people belong to no party and to no creed. [Prolonged applause.] They are the Republic's legacy to be sacredly treasured and carefully transmitted to future generations. [Prolonged applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen, this closes the exercises of the day, but the House is still in session, and Members are requested to retain their seats while our guests retire.

Gen. Pershing and his staff retired from the Hall amid loud applause, the Members rising.

The Members of the Senate retired.

THE MILITARY REVIEWS OF 1865 AND 1919.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing therein certain observations which I have made upon the grand review of yesterday in comparison with that of 1865.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the review of yesterday and that of 1865. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9205.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9205, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR NAVY DEPARTMENT.

For additional employees from October 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, inclusive, at annual rates of compensation, as follows: Clerks—10 of class 4, 10 of class 3, 10 of class 2, 10 of class 1; assistant messenger at $720; 2 laborers at $660 each; messenger boy at $480; in all, $46,890.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman a question, and I move to strike out the last word. I notice that the appropriations for clerks in the office of the Auditor for the Navy are enormously larger than anywhere else. I suppose that, of course, there is some reason for it. I would like to know what it is; that is all.

Mr. GOOD. The work in the auditor's department of the Navy is very much in arrears, more than a year behind in the auditing of the accounts.

Mr. LITTLE. Why is that?

Mr. GOOD. The work is behind because of the unusually large expenditures during the war. The statement made before the committee was that they were considerably more than a year behind with their work. They asked for $164,000 for these clerks, and while the committee recognized the fact that this auditing department was behind with its work, we felt that with the force that we were giving, coupled with the further fact that the expenditures now must commence to fall off, this would enable the Navy Department to catch up with its work.

Mr. LITTLE. The $164,000 is for all the auditors, is it not?

Mr. GOOD. No. That was just for the Navy Department alone, the amount that was estimated for this deficiency, and we only gave $46,890.

Mr. LITTLE. Is there any more reason why they should be more behind that the others?

Mr. GOOD. They have a large force there. We recognized the fact that there would be a great amount of work thrust on the auditors of the War Department, and the legislative bill was perhaps a little more generous to that department than to this one. We felt this appropriation absolutely necessary, if these accounts are to be audited at some time within close proximity of the date of their payment.

Mr. LITTLE. I think they ought to be audited all right.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Referring to the discussion as to the accounts in the office of the Auditor of the Navy Department a word of explanation may be helpful with reference to this delinquency. It is not uncommon for this department to advance to the paymasters on shipboard large sums of money when vessels are starting out on cruises. They may be gone for six months; possibly for a year. Moneys are received through the various fiscal agencies around the world when the cash on shipboard runs short. It is nothing uncommon for these paymasters to hold their accounts in reserve until they return from a cruise. That makes them very late in delivery to the administrative office. When so delivered the administrative office would have 60 days under the law within which to make the administrative examination and forward them to the Auditor for the Navy Department. The Auditor for the Navy Department would then, of course, take them up in order, and from the date of sailing it will require in many instances the lapse of a year, and possibly a year and a half, before such accounts are audited in their regular turn. Many ships, we know, have been out for a considerable period of time, and the closing of the war will enable those paymasters on shipboard to return a large amount of work to the department and to the auditing office. Hence you readily see that under existing conditions the ordinary return of accounts would be delayed and delinquencies would be multiplied because of these peculiar conditions. I can readily see why a much larger force would be needed in that office just at this time for a period of perhaps six months or more to clear up such delinquent work.

I make this explanation because of the fact that I have traced this out many times in connection with the business of the other auditing offices of the department, and I know that it is quite natural that such conditions would appear at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Operating supplies: For operating supplies for public buildings, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $157,406.11.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TILSON: Page 5, after line 25, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion and with the consent of the contractors, to modify and readjust the terms of the contract for the sale of the old post-office property in New Haven, Conn., entered into March 13, 1917, in such manner as he may deem equitable and just, if he shall determine that said contract has become inequitable and unjust on account of the unforeseen conditions arising since its execution, with respect to the Government's failure to deliver the property as soon as expected."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, a new Federal building for New Haven, Conn., having been provided for by an authorization and an appropriation, the Government proceeded to sell the old post-office building for future delivery. It was sold for the sum of $445,000. One-fourth of the purchase price was to be paid at once, which was done, and the other payments were to be deferred and made in annual installments. The purchasers have fulfilled their part of the contract. On account of the war it was practically impossible to finish the building on time. The Government failed to finish the new building until almost a year and a half beyond the time anticipated, and consequently could not deliver the old building at the time agreed. Therefore, instead of delivering the old building to the purchasers on March 21, 1918, as the Government had stipulated by contract it would do, it did not give possession of the building to the purchasers until August 12, 1919.

Meanwhile, not only were the purchasers losing interest on the advance payment already made but in accordance with the contract they paid interest on the deferred payments and were kept out of the use of the property from March 21 until August 12, 1919.

The Secretary of the Treasury over his own signature has made a statement of the account as it stands, and has asked that this legislation—for it is legislation—be enacted in order to authorize him to make just and equitable the contract which has become unjust and inequitable on account of the failure of the United States to perform its part of the contract. Under these conditions, Mr. Chairman, in order that the injustice may be righted as soon as possible, I move this amendment. I hope the chairman of the committee will be not constrained to make the point of order against it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. GOOD. I understand the purchase price was $445,000?

Mr. TILSON. That is right.

Mr. GOOD. And we paid $111,250 as the first installment in March, 1918?

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman is correct as to the amount, but the payment was made much earlier than that.

Mr. GOOD. The Government was to give possession March 21, 1918?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; and it was not given until August 12, 1919.

Mr. GOOD. What does the gentleman's amendment do?

Mr. TILSON. My amendment authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust this contract in accordance with the facts; that is, that the purchasers may be repaid what they lost by way of interest, and that their indebtedness for the interest on deferred payments on the building shall be canceled.

Mr. GOOD. Has the gentleman taken this up with the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. TILSON. I have; and I have his letter here.

Mr. GOOD. What does he say?

Mr. TILSON. This is what the Secretary of the Treasury says in his letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 30, 1919.

Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I note your letter of the 15th instant, transmitting the petition of the Union & New Haven Trust Co., for relief in connection with the company's contract for the purchase of the old post office in New Haven, Conn.

The department feels that under all the circumstances it would be fair to give the purchasers the relief prayed for, i. e., to cancel the deferred installments' interest for from March 21, 1918, to August 12, 1919, the date possession was given, and for the Government to pay the purchasers interest at 4 per cent (the same rate charged them) upon their cash payment for the same "overtime." This is what they asked for in their petition to Congress and also in their petition received here March 4, 1918.

Thus, with a few minor items, adjustment would be as follows:

Purchase price		$445,000.00
Cash payment		111,250.00
Deferred, in three annual installments		333,750.00
Purchasers have paid two years' interest to Mar. 21, 1919		26,700.00
Government is entitled to interest for first year		13,350.00
Paid interest to be refunded		13,350.00
Plus interest from the Government on the cash payment for "overtime"		6,192.92
Gross credit to contractors' account		19,542.92
Less interest on belated cash payment—12 days late	$148.33
Less interest on past due deferred installments' interest which should have been paid Sept. 21, 1917 ($342.65), and Mar. 21, 1918 ($209.15), but not paid until Jan. 3, 1919	551.80
Net credit to purchasers' account		18,842.79

Under this arrangement deferred installments would be pushed forward from the dates originally stipulated for a period corresponding to the alleged delay in possession, i. e., 1 year, 4 months, and 21 days, and the interest thereon would begin August 12, 1919, the date possession was given, this postdating to be in lieu of the modification of contract heretofore granted purchasers as to deferred installments.

For your convenience I inclose a tentative draft of the bill.

The purchasers' petition and their attorneys' letter of the 13th instant are returned herewith.

Very truly, yours, CARTER GLASS, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. The relief asked for amounts to this: To cancel the deferred installments of interest from March 21, 1918, to August 12, 1919, the date when possession was given, and that the Government pay the purchasers interest at 4 per cent during this period for their cash payment. The correction amounts to $18,842.79.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that my attention was called to the matter by him after the hearings were concluded. I think the statement shows a meritorious claim against the Government, but I do think that a matter of this kind ought to be pretty fully thrashed out in the committee. We have tried to make every department prove its case.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The Lord knows—I do not, and I do not know that anybody else does—how many different claims that are absolutely meritorious are unadjusted. I have only one objection to this as one Member of the House. Query: Are we not liable to get this bill turned into a claims bill instead of an appropriation bill if we let down the bars? And should not either the Committee on Claims or the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds or other appropriate committee legislate in the premises?

Mr. TILSON. Of course the committee can protect itself at any time by the objection of a single member.

Mr. CANNON. If the bars are let down in one case, we may have 10 or 20 pages of these claims. If you go to the Senate——

Mr. TILSON. Possibly the Senate will put it on.

Mr. CANNON. Possibly.

Mr. TILSON. But I should rather have it put on here if I can.

Mr. CANNON. The only objection I have is what I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has again expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I want to get some information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE My point of order is that it is not germane. I reserve it for a moment to get some information.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is pending.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, of course there are a great many requests from Members for items of this kind, and personally I have not had the time to investigate them, nor have the other members of the subcommittee to whom Members have gone with regard to these items. They are items that really ought to come in the regular way before the committee; and if we should waive the point of order on one, the gentleman from Connecticut can well see how we would have to extend a like privilege to other Members of the House. Therefore, while I believe that the gentleman has a case that is meritorious and one that the Government will have to take care of, yet for the present, in view of the fact that there will have to be a deficiency bill along in January, I suppose, I feel compelled to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

For expenses of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, as authorized by law: For salaries of the director and commissioners, and of such deputies, assistants, accountants, experts, clerks, and other employees in the District of Columbia, as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, $4,000,000; stationery and minor office supplies, $550,000; miscellaneous expenses, including telephones, telegrams, freight, express, foreign postage, not exceeding $100 for street car fares, not exceeding $500 for law books, books of reference, and periodicals, $60,000; not to exceed $800,000 of the appropriation for "salaries and expenses of employees engaged in field investigations and expenses of branch offices, fiscal year 1920," is made available for printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, and necessary printing of forms, etc., for use abroad may be done abroad; furniture, equipment, and supplies, $75,000; traveling expenses (exclusive of field investigations), $10,000; purchase, maintenance, and repair of motor-propelled passenger vehicle, $1,000; for payment to the National Museum on account of repairs and other expenses made necessary by the occupancy of that building by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, $5,640; in all, $4,701,640: Provided, That all employees appropriated for by this paragraph shall be engaged exclusively on the work of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance during the fiscal year 1920.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Appropriations Committee a question. During the war there were thousands of employees whose employment was authorized in appropriation bills alone, and the necessity for whose employment was by reason of the war alone. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what steps have been taken by the Appropriations Committee toward removing these unnecessary employees from the pay roll of the Government and sending them back home?

Mr. GOOD. Not very much.

Mr. BLANTON. Has there been any such action? In other words, if we keep these employees here, it may be done only by making appropriations for their salaries.

Mr. GOOD. We have here by months a statement of the number of employees in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not referring particularly to that department, because possibly it will need the war-service employees more than almost any other department of the Government. I am asking with regard to all departments of Government and the extra war workers whose services may not be needed now and in the future.

Mr. GOOD. The Civil Service Commission gave us some information with regard to the number of employees in the various departments of the Government, and the gentleman will find the table on page 11 of the hearings. It shows that the total for the 37 weeks from November 10, 1918, to July 25, 1919, was changed as follows: There were additions of 39,392 employees during that period, and there were separations from the service of 42,002, making a net reduction from November 10, 1918, the day before the armistice was signed, until July 25, 1919, of 2,610.

Mr. BLANTON. And that is a very small reduction, comparatively, I am sure the chairman of the committee will admit.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, yes. There are about 101,000 Government employees now in Washington.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the chairman of the committee what is going to be the policy of the Committee on Appropriations, in so far as its power lies, in sending back to their homes these thousands of unnecessary employees from now on?

Mr. GOOD. Many of these employees are in the Treasury Department and in the War Department. For example, the Treasury Department alone has 31,442 employees. The War Department has 26,692 employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have additional time in which to state the policy of the committee, if it has a policy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the time of the chairman of the committee may be extended so as to allow him to answer a question as to the policy of the committee, if it has a policy. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations has only one policy, whether it be for money to buy material or for the employment of clerks, and that is not to appropriate money for the purchase of a single dollar's worth of material or for the employment of a single clerk that is not absolutely necessary for the department. That is the only policy that the committee can have, and the difficulty, as the gentleman can well see, is not the policy of the Committee on Appropriations, but it is the policy and practice of the departments. I am satisfied that there are an excess of clerks, for example, in the War Department, who should be discharged and who should have been discharged long ago. A few weeks ago an officer came to me from the War Department and said he was just leaving the service. He said he went through various departments and took with him his secretary, and would open a door and would count and would say to his secretary, "Ten men and five women; three of them busy." He said he was amazed to find the number of women in the department who were crocheting.

I wish you would go down some morning to the Treasury Department and look at the number of magazines spread on the curb right in front of the Treasury Building. I think I counted one day over 100 different publications which were there on the curb, an invitation to clerks to buy; and the clerks were coming along by the hundreds buying them, putting them under their arms and going in to their desks.

Mr. BLANTON. Are we not responsible for that?

Mr. GOOD. No. How can any committee or Congress itself do anything to prevent a practice of that kind. It is a departmental matter pure and simple.

Mr. BLANTON. We ought to bear down on them hard.

Mr. GOOD. It is a matter of the efficiency of every department of the Government; and the Committee on Appropriations have tried at all times to make every department come in and prove its case, that it needs these men, and it has only given the appropriations when the persons responsible for the work of that bureau or department would come before it and say that they were running behind, that their clerks were working overtime, that they were not reading, that they were not crocheting, but were doing their work. And when that showing was made, we have had to give the money.

Mr. BLANTON. Just one question more.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If we stop their pay, they will have to go home, will they not?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Then let us stop their pay, if they are unnecessary.

Mr. GOOD. But whose pay are you going to stop?

Mr. BLANTON. The pay of all unnecessary employees.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why not stop the Government?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance has been under fire ever since its organization, and what has been the result? The other day we increased the salary of the director, for one thing, and now we are adding more employees. I am not prepared to say that the Committee on Appropriations is at fault in the matter. I do not know where the fault is, but I do know that we are not getting anywhere, and, just as the gentleman from Texas said, instead of decreasing these expenses we are increasing them every day. Have we gotten any better service out of it? Perhaps the new director is improving the service. He has not had time to demonstrate whether he is or is not, but no one has been impressed that way so far.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that there is a joint committee of the Senate and the House investigating this matter of employees?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not that I am aware of—that is, investigating the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. If there is I have not the benefit of any of their investigations.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, there is a committee investigating the reclassification of salaries in all of the departments.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But that has nothing to do with this matter at all, if that is what the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS] was referring to. What I am talking about is the efficiency of employees.

Mr. DALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DALE. As I understand the gentleman, he says that there is no committee investigating the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not say that, but I am not aware of any.

Mr. DALE. There is a committee investigating the War Risk Insurance, and when they make their report I think the gentleman will be satisfied that they have been investigating it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I sincerely hope that will be the result. I have been waiting for something of that kind for a long time. Will the gentleman inform me what committee it is?

Mr. DALE. It is the Committee on Investigation of Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then I think that committee has been very well employed.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, there was a resolution before the Committee on Rules asking for authority to investigate by a special committee the War Risk Insurance Bureau. Before the committee came the new director, preceding the one now in office, Col. Lindsley. He had been in office only 10 days, and he asked that we give him a chance to see what could be done. He stated to the committee that the War Risk Insurance Bureau had ceased to function. We thought it was a proper thing to give him some time to see what he could do. He has resigned. Another director has been appointed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I understood that; yes.

Mr. FESS. I do not know anything else that is promising other than the change of heads and the increases of salary.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] I would say that I talked to several members of the Committee on Rules, after the director, Col. Lindsley, appeared there, and they said it was the consensus of opinion, after he came before the committee and explained the work he was trying to do, that an investigation would impede the work rather than make it more efficient.

Mr. FESS. That is correct. That is the reason we did not report the rule.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. The Committee on Appropriations attempted to get, and probably got, as much information from the director as they could with reference to the comparative cost of doing the work in the department and doing that same work by the ordinary insurance companies; but after going over the hearings I am unable to make any satisfactory comparison. What little comparison I can make would induce me to believe that it is costing at least twice as much down at the department to have work done as it would cost an ordinary insurance company. This department ought to have its work in such shape that it would be decreasing every day. There can not be any question about that, and yet the director comes in and asks for an appropriation and gets an appropriation for additional employees, although the allotment and allowance division is passing out of existence. This bureau ought to have its work so systematized that from time to time and from day to day it would be growing less and less as it goes along. Instead of that the director reports that he must have more employees. The only way to ascertain about that is to have some one investigate the efficiency of the department, and the director himself ought to be the first one to welcome such an investigation. So far as I know, he has introduced no objection to it, but the investigation ought to be made, and it ought to be a thorough one. No further additions should be made to his force until a report is made showing what the conditions in fact are.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I notice that on page 7, line 17, there is an item of $550,000 for stationery and minor office supplies, and on page 8, line 3, I find an item of $75,000 for equipment and supplies. What is the difference between the supplies asked for on page 7 and the supplies asked for on page 8?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the stationery allowance of $550,000 will not give anything like the amount that was appropriated for stationery last year. Our appropriation for stationery was very small for this year, but $550,000 was estimated for stationery, and no appropriation is carried for the $2,290,000 asked for advertising.

So that by denying the amount asked for advertising to get in touch with the holders of policies of war-risk insurance the department will have to get in touch with them by correspondence, so the committee allowed the full amount estimated. The $75,000 referred to is to be expended for the purchase of machines—addressographs, and the like—on which will be placed the names of persons who are paying their insurance and who are regarded as permanent holders of policies. This item is for the purchase of machinery or supplies of this kind.

Mr. KNUTSON. Did the committee look into the relative cost of conducting this bureau and the cost of conducting a similar organization under private control?

Mr. GOOD. We tried to get some information, but the gentleman can well understand that here was an organization of over four millions of policyholders at one time, and immediately upon demobilization the boys dropped their insurance, and an effort was started toward having the men keep their insurance and for those who had allowed their premiums to lapse to continue carrying their policies. This has been a herculean task, involving a great deal of work, and I take it a good deal of money has been expended in that way. Then, as the gentleman can well understand, the law provides for a certain amount of work which the private insurance companies do not have. For example, tied up with the actual insurance provision is the allotment and allowance and compensation features that, as a general rule, old-line life insurance companies do not carry. There are, of course, companies that have sick benefits and compensation insurance, but no private company does all these things; and the matter has been in such a transition state, and I think that the director well explained the matter by stating that until we could get down to something like normal conditions a fair comparison is not possible.

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, as I remember, this bureau was organized by the act approved October 5, 1917. I dare say every Member of this House is receiving letters at this late date, 9 or 10 months after the armistice, from allottees and other dependents saying they have written to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and have been unable to receive any reply, and they must appeal to their Congressmen to get action. I am very glad to hear the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. DALE] state that this bureau is going to receive a thorough overhauling. I think it needs it. I think this bill should carry an item for ball bearings to put under that bureau, so we can get a little action. I yield back whatever time there remains.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this bureau was created solely in the interest of the soldiers and sailors who were engaged in this World War, and ever since its creation there has been from various quarters considerable criticism of the bureau. I know there is a disposition upon the part of some to transfer the jurisdiction of this bureau from the Treasury Department, where it now exists, and place it in the Pension Bureau, but I do not say that this has inspired all of the criticisms that have been offered. Mr. Chairman, here is a great insurance company or a bureau having to do with insurance amounting at the present time to about thirty-eight or thirty-nine billions of dollars, not only with the insurance of the soldier to look after but with allotments and allowances made by the soldiers on behalf of their dependents, and also with the claims for compensation that have come from those injured during the war. This business was thrust upon this bureau all at once. There was not an opportunity, as in the case of an ordinary insurance company, for it to gradually grow and increase in size, but it was dumped all at once upon this bureau, and necessarily there was a great deal of confusion incident to the fact that the director found himself, upon the organization of this bureau, with a great volume of business and hundreds of untrained clerks to take care of it. Now, gentlemen are familiar with what has been done with reference to this bureau. I think there have been two or three directors of the bureau since its first creation. The present director took charge several months ago. The gentleman from Iowa says that he has hardly had an opportunity to show just what he can do with reference to it. And I want to say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I have not found the difficulty of which he complains, and I think I have had a good deal of business to do with this bureau in behalf of the constituents from my district. I have always found prompt attention. Some cases have been held up for investigation in the field, but I have always found a uniform desire on the part of those in charge of this bureau to give those matters attention.

Now, the gentleman must remember that this bureau is now engaged in converting insurance policies. This bureau is engaged in receiving applications from soldiers who carry insurance and in converting those policies into term insurance, and they need clerks for that reason. In addition to that, there are hundreds of compensation claims that are coming in daily. They have to have a great medical force down there for the purpose of examining those claims and seeing that exact justice is done to the Treasury and to the soldier who is making the application.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to just how many employees the bureau has and how they are divided as to work, showing the number under allotment, under compensation, and under insurance?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think all that information is in the hearings, but I can not from memory give the gentleman the manner in which those various employees are divided.

Mr. NEWTON of Indiana. That is in the hearings in connection with the sundry civil bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; with the deficiency bill which is now under consideration.

Mr. GOOD. On pages 197 and 198.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will find it on pages 197 and 198. There you will find a full statement from the director showing just how many employees there are in the bureau at the present time and how they are engaged. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman spoke about the disposition on the part of some Members to transfer this department from the Treasury to the Pension Bureau. Does the gentleman know whether the Treasury officials give any attention to this bureau?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman know whether any of the Treasury officials give any attention to this bureau?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Why, undoubtedly they give attention to it. There is one Assistant Secretary a great portion of whose time is taken up with this particular bureau. I refer to Assistant Secretary Shouse, a former Member of this House.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is not the gentleman aware that the Assistant Secretary that we are getting pretty close to spends a great deal of time traveling around on free transportation in the Railroad Administration?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know to what the gentleman alludes. The gentleman from Iowa has information which I do not possess.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will examine the records he will have no trouble in finding out who it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended one minute in order that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee may be extended for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIEGEL. What has become of the plan to divide the country into several districts and move the offices to various cities throughout the country, so that each particular section of the country can be handled from those offices instead of from here?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Director of the War Risk Insurance appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and requested that he be authorized to use funds for the purpose of establishing a branch office in each of the different States of the Union. At least he stated it was his purpose to establish them in nearly all the States. He stated that there might be some States where there were so few soldiers that it would not be necessary to have a branch office. But the committee did not give him that authority.

Mr. SIEGEL. Does not the gentleman think that the work could be handled in that way more quickly and thereby remove from Washington a large number of these clerks?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That was the idea of the director. But the gentleman from New York will remember that we had branch pension offices throughout the country and that Congress abolished them a few years ago with a saving of more than $200,000 a year, and, so far as I have heard, there has been no criticism of the action of Congress in discontinuing those branch offices. On the contrary, I think the service was improved.

Mr. SIEGEL. Except that at that time you were dealing with a limited number of people and to-day you have to deal with 4,000,000 of families for the purpose of reaching them. For instance, if you had an office in the city of New York you could reach the State of New Jersey as well as the State of New York.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think there is an advantage. But, as I have stated, the director has now authority to establish not to exceed eight offices throughout the country.

Mr. SIEGEL. Does the gentleman know how he intends to do that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think he already has those offices, one of which is in New York City.

Mr. SIEGEL. If that be the fact, the director should at least inform the Representatives from New York City, so that their constituents could more quickly remedy defects in papers instead of having to write to Washington, causing unnecessary hardships and delays.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The Bureau of War Risk Insurance asks for $6,275,370 as a deficiency for clerk hire. The committee has reported out $4,000,000 for this purpose, and in reporting out $4,000,000 we do not provide for an organization nearly as large as that now engaged in the bureau. It was the opinion of the committee that inasmuch as the work in the Division of Allotments and Allowances should fall off very rpidly from this on, the 2,258 clerks employed in that division might soon be scattered throughout the bureau and take up other work that there was in the bureau, such as the transfer of policies and with regard to having the soldiers keep up their insurance. The committee cut to a point where the director feels he will have to ask for an additional deficiency later on. The committee believes that with real efficient methods in the department—and we feel that the director is going to do all he can to bring about a degree of efficiency in that department that will permit him to reduce his force—the appropriations will be enough to permit him to carry on the work.

The director is very much in earnest over an estimate that the committee disallowed, and that is the right to establish in every State a branch office. As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] well stated, the Government has had considerable experience with regard to the establishment of branch offices and the difficulty in separating these branch offices from the Government. We had a number of agencies throughout the States with regard to disbursement of pensions—18 all told—and finally those agencies were dissolved and the work was brought here to Washington, with the result that there was a saving of about $200,000 a year in the appropriations made for the disbursements of pensions to the old soldiers. Now, this work is different, the director desiring to have State agencies that will compare somewhat with the State agencies of large insurance companies, with agents trying to keep in touch with these men who have this insurance. Since the hearing the director has appealed to the members of the committee as well as to the chairman. He is very earnest in his demands, but there seems to be so much objection to engaging upon a program that is so big and fraught with so many possibilities for big expenditures that the committee is a unit in declining this recommendation. I have spoken in regard to the advertising. The department desires $2,595,000 for advertising. The committee decided not to allow this amount. It is thought this would establish a policy that is not in line with the historic policy of the Government by engaging upon buying space in the newspapers for advertisements for work of this kind, and therefore the committee refused to grant the amount asked for.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment just to make this observation.

I think the members of the committee are in entire sympathy with the problem that the Appropriations Committee has on its hands—the effort to reduce the force that has been induced by the stress of war. Every department holds on as long as possible to what force it has, and some of them are increasing. Our great desire, of course, is to reduce this force. Those agencies that have been created under the stress of war are appealing to every Member of Congress to continue them, putting it up to us that unless we do it we are not forward looking, because these things were created under the stress of war and ought to be carried on in time of peace. We will face that demand right along in the next year. I appreciate the difficulty of any committee to make these reductions, but most certainly, gentlemen, we have got to use the knife somewhere. [Applause.] It seems to me there is nothing more inevitable than that necessity. To-day's daily statement of the Treasury shows more than $1,000,000,000 expenditure this month. I know how the chairman of this committee and the other members of this committee on both sides of the aisle have to operate under these pleadings on the part of these various agencies. The truth about the matter is that this War Risk Bureau has the biggest problem that will probably be inherited from the war, and they have some semblance of a necessity for an increased force. But, Mr. Chairman, Col. Lindsley said openly that it had ceased to function, and the Rules Committee agreed to give him a chance to see what could be done. Every Member of this House knows that in his effort to accomplish a reform he found the situation such that he resigned. Now comes the present director, promoted, and the only letters I have received from him are promises that this or that will be immediately looked after. Universal complaints come from everywhere that nothing especially efficient is being done, and every Congressman that visits the department is faced with the situation that here are supernumerary clerks in the clerical force almost clogging the department, so that you can scarcely get through when you want to go through a department, and still they are saying that the efficiency of the agency will not permit them to reduce the expenses, but that we must increase the expenses. [Applause.] I am getting tired of these pleas, and I want to congratulate the committee for using the knife to the degree that it has already done it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. I heartily agree with what the gentleman from Ohio says with reference to the Committee on Appropriations. Does not the gentleman think that the Committee on Appropriations is greatly handicapped by having bureau heads before it whose sole desire in life seems to be to get appropriations to spend and squander?

Mr. FESS. In reply to my friend I think that any committee is embarrassed by having the facts presented by heads of departments or bureau chiefs without having opportunity to confirm the necessity through an investigation. What I would like to see done would be to see some sort of an investigation made to ascertain if this clerical force can not be reduced, and not merely take the word of a chief. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the last four words.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has intimated that possibly only those who are interested in a transfer of this bureau to the Bureau of Pensions have had any complaints to register against the War Risk Insurance Bureau. I have no interest myself as to whether this work is administered in one department of the Government or another, but I do want to see it administered.

My own experience has been somewhat like this: Sometimes we would get replies from the department in my office and sometimes we would not, but repeatedly I have received letters from men in the service and from their dependents who tell me that they have written the bureau and have not been able to get even an acknowledgment from them. Those things ought not to exist. Furthermore, not long ago my secretary told me that she had been unable to get action on several claims, and I had to call up the secretary to the director and ask him to get busy and see that somebody got on the job there.

My own opinion is that when this work was started, when the bureau started in October of 1917, if the primary thought had been service instead of politics, we would not now have a department in such condition that no one seems to be able to straighten it out. When this most important bureau was started they placed it under the jurisdiction of a man who was then Secretary of the Treasury, with its manifold duties to perform, and also Director General of Railroads, with the added duties of that position. Why did they not get some insurance man, some one connected with the organization end of a great insurance business, and have him organize that bureau? If they had, it would not be in the condition it is to-day.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the very first director of this bureau was a very prominent insurance man?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No, I am not; and if he was I am fearful of the fact that he did not stay there very long, because of the situation and because of the one who was at the head of it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He was at the head of it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. He was at the head of it only in name.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He was in full charge of it, and the present director is an insurance man, and his predecessor was an insurance man.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Have they not been handicapped by the fact that their superior was Secretary of the Treasury, busy with Liberty loans and trying to run the railroads of the country? Why put everything under one departmental head?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia rose.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to many of the speeches, made in this connection and I do not see why it is that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is made the special target of so much vehement and cruel attack. That the bureau deserves criticism in some respects may be true, but the same may be said of other departments of the Government. My experience in connection with the work of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is that much of the criticism which it has received is directly traceable to the action of the War Department in connection with the payment of allotments. The action of the War Department in declining to pay allotments upon the authority of the papers on file with the Bureau of War Risk and insisting upon a new authority from the soldier has caused an incredible amount of delay and criticism which has been chiefly directed against the bureau. The real difficulty of the situation is not that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is indisposed to answer letters. The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota] has brought that charge against the officials of the bureau, and so have others. It may be true that in many cases much time elapsed before a letter is answered. But that delay occurs in many of the departments of the Government. Any Member who has had much occasion to call on the War Department has long since found out that the Bureau of War Risk is by no means alone in respect of delay in making response to inquiries. I have had a great deal of experience with a number of the departments, and have had many cases of delayed replies to urgent inquiries. Many of my constituents who have taken up matters with the War Department, and written once, twice, and perhaps three times, have given up in despair, and later made this appeal to me: "Can you not do something to have our letters answered?" I do not think it is quite fair to single out the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for these envenomed and sweeping attacks.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have but a moment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I just want to corroborate what the gentleman says on that point. I wrote to the War Department last spring concerning a certain matter, and I have just received a reply.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman confirms and corroborates my statement with respect to delay in other quarters in making reply to letters of inquiry. The Bureau of War Risk Insurance transacts an immense volume of daily business. When it began its work it did not possess an experienced corps of employees, like the Pension Office. The suggestion has been made that its work should be turned over to the Pension Office. I think that would be the most unfortunate step that could be taken. The fact is that the War Risk Insurance Bureau has had a most gigantic task imposed upon it. Unlike the other departments of the Government, it did not begin its work with a nucleus of trained and experienced employees. The work of that bureau was enormous from the very beginning, and it had to be discharged in large measure by inexperienced and untrained clerks. That fact has caused a great deal of confusion and delay. But that was inevitable. It was impossible to enter upon an absolutely new line of work such as this bureau has been doing, gather up the necessary clerks as best it could, at a time when every other department was scrambling for clerks, and accomplish much better results than have been accomplished.

Reference has been made to the fact that Secretary McAdoo was both Director of the Railways and Secretary of the Treasury. Conceded. But he did not interfere with the conduct of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. He gave the director of that bureau a free hand. So far as he was able to do under existing conditions, he selected the very best assistants that he could secure, but for the time being they were confronted by a stupendous task, one sufficient to tax the utmost capacity of any body of men that could be assembled under normal conditions, much less under the competition for efficient human material that prevailed during the period of war. The lack of adequate and sufficient buildings to house the employees and store the ever-increasing accumulation of papers has also greatly impeded the efficient organization and conduct of the work of this bureau.

Mr. KNUTSON. I agree with what the gentleman has said with reference to the Pension Department. It takes from 11 to 15 months to get action in the Pension Department.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes. I have had that experience. One gentleman says, "Why can we not have an investigation, and ascertain the actual conditions in this bureau?" I think it was my friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS] who made this statement. Well, why do not you have it? You have a majority of the House. Appoint a committee, and begin this investigation. I have voted for every investigation that has been asked for, and if our Republican friends wish to investigate the work of this bureau I will be glad to vote for a resolution to that end.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes; certainly.

Mr. FESS. Personally I was in favor of an investigation.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Let us have one.

Mr. FESS. But in each case we were asked to give them a little longer time, and see whether they could not work it out.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why give heed to such requests. The gentleman stated his proposition as if there were some one interfering or seeking to interfere with the desire of the House of Representatives to order such an investigation. I know no reason why this investigation should not be ordered if desired, and will gladly support a proposition of that character.

Mr. FESS. My contention is that it is not safe to take the estimate of a bureau chief as to the needs of his clerical force.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes. For that reason I suggested that you should disregard the objections of the bureau chiefs and order an immediate investigation.

Mr. FESS. I should like to have it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Well, there is no reason why you should not have it. Your party controls the present House.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman from Virginia has confused my remarks somewhat with the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio. I was the one who suggested that there was no investigation going on and asking why it was not made.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman may have contributed to the contention of the gentleman from Ohio. I ask now, as I have asked heretofore, why not have this investigation? No one can hinder us from taking that action, if it is desired. This House is in supreme control of the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General shall formulate and promulgate such regulations as will enable persons insured under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act to make payments of premiums at such post offices or branches or stations of post offices as they may designate or to any city letter carrier or rural carrier while on duty. The Post Office Department is hereby authorized and directed to receive sums so tendered in payment of such premiums, and to receive and transmit to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance applications for the reinstatement of lapsed insurance.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that paragraph is new legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order on the paragraph. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have not examined very closely recently into the rulings with regard to the Holman rule. I am not advised fully as to the extent that a reduction must be shown on the face of the bill or whether it may be shown on the bill as compared with the estimates.

What happened in this case was this: The Secretary of the Treasury, by House Document No. 144, made an estimate of $1,800,000 for an appropriation to pay for money orders. The plan was to let these boys who have policies of insurance pay the local postmaster or pay the carrier or other postal official, and for the post office to charge for that service, and then for the Government to appropriate to pay the postal employee for performing that service. That was the request that was made by the Secretary of the Treasury. Suppose we had granted the request of the Secretary of the Treasury. The appropriation would necessarily have to be in the neighborhood of $1,800,000 for that service, simply for paying for the money orders. Now, instead of accepting that estimate, the committee thought that, in view of the fact that we had recently increased the pay of postal employees $50,000,000 a year, the postal employee would be a pretty mean sort of a fellow who would not be willing to collect a few dollars from an ex-service man and send the money to the Government of the United States. Therefore we provided that his part of the compensation should not be appropriated out of the Treasury, but we provided by this legislation for the performance of the work. It certainly is a reduction in the appropriation that would otherwise be made without the legislation. While it does not appear on the face of the bill, if the Chair will take the estimate submitted through the Speaker to the Committee on Appropriations he will find that there was an estimate for $1,800,000. This legislation obviates the necessity of making that appropriation. Certainly it is a reduction, and we are able to make the reduction only through the legislation that is objected to.

I do not understand why there should be any objection from the Post Office Department to the employees of that department performing this service. I do not know why the Postmaster General should ask some one in Congress to interpose a point of order to a proposition that I think every Member of this House will agree is a businesslike proposition, and I trust the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] will withdraw the point of order and let the committee vote upon the simple question whether or not we will permit these postal employees to have the right to perform this service without additional compensation.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the director of the bureau desire this legislation?

Mr. GOOD. The Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance came before us in support of his estimate. I do not think the committee took up with the director the matter of this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the point of order discussed and not the merits of the proposition.

Mr. GOOD. I think, Mr. Chairman, I have said all I desire to say with regard to the point of order. I do not know just to what extent the holdings of the Chair have gone with regard to requiring the reduction to be shown on the face of the bill itself, but it does seem to me that in a case like this, in a deficiency bill where an estimate is made coming to the committee through the office of the Speaker of the House asking for $1,800,000, if the committee can work out a plan whereby the same work can be accomplished by putting a little legislation on the statute books and thereby obviate the necessity of making the appropriation, it is at least along the line of good business, and it ought to be along the line of good legislation, and there ought not to be anything in the rule so technical as to prevent that being done.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for just a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. BLACK rose.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; but if the gentleman from Texas desires recognition I will yield for him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to call the Chair's attention to one thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The ordinary rule that applies to amendment is not the same as that which applies to this provision which is brought in by the committee. In the case of amendments to the bill offered from the floor, the rule is that they must reduce the amount of the appropriations carried by the bill, but where the provision is brought in by the committee itself it seems to me to be covered by the last provision of the Holman rule:

Provided, That it shall be further in order to amend such bills upon the report of the committee—

Which I take it to be the committee bringing in the bill—or any joint commission authorized by law or the House Members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment being germane to the subject matter of the bill—shall retrench expenditures.

And this certainly is germane—

This will retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, in arguing a point of order I do not think it is proper for a Member to go out of the record, as the lawyers would say, and argue extraneous matter not connected with the point of order. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], the chairman of this committee, I think did that very thing to some extent in the way of criticism of the Post Office Department for opposing this legislative proposal. As a matter of fact the Post Office Department, so far as I know or am informed, is not opposed to any proper cooperation that can be arranged between it and the War Risk Insurance Bureau, but the House can readily see that it is a big proposition to make the Post Office Department the collecting agency for 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 insurance policies, if indeed that many shall be renewed, and in the hearings the Post Office Department and the post-office officials were not asked to appear before the committee and work out comprehensive and adequate legislation along this line. This is too big a subject to be treated in just one paragraph of an appropriation bill. It will have to be worked out in greater detail than this paragraph now under discussion would do. What would be the result if we adopted an amendment of this sort? It would make 43,000 rural carriers collecting agents; it would make some 36,000 or 37,000 letter carriers collecting agents, making more than 80,000 in all. They would be under no bond for this particular purpose. The bonds which they are now working under cover only the receipts of the Postal Service, and I submit that it would be imposing upon the Post Office Department and the heads of that department a financial responsibility without proper safeguards that would not be warranted under the circumstances. I know that there is no higher class of men than the rural carriers; I know that there is no higher class of men than the letter carriers, and for the most part they would administer the duty well, but it is a responsibility that we ought not to ask the Post Office Department to assume without proper legislation and proper safeguards. That was the attitude of the Postmaster General. If in the wisdom of the Congress it seems proper to make the Post Office Department the collecting agency for the War Risk Insurance Bureau, then that subject ought to be gone into in a comprehensive way before the proper committee, and the parties in interest ought to be heard. It was for that reason that I made the point of order, and not because I have the slightest antagonism to any properly-worked-out plan of cooperation between the two departments.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

For purchase of professional and scientific books, law books, including their exchange; books of reference, blank books, pamphlets, periodicals, newspapers, maps; typewriters and adding machines; furniture and repairs to same; carpets, matting, oilcloth, file cases, towels, ice, brooms, soap, sponges, fuel, gas, and heating apparatus for and repairs to buildings (outside of the State, War, and Navy Department Building) occupied by the War Department and its bureaus; purchase and exchange of motor trucks and motor cycles; maintenance, repair, and operation of motor trucks and motor cycles, and one motor-propelled, passenger-carrying vehicle, to be used only for official purposes; freight and express charges; street car fares, not exceeding $1,000; and other absolutely necessary expenses, including a per diem allowance not to exceed $4 in lieu of subsistence, $400,000.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 13, after the word "and" in line 12, strike out line 13 and the words "only for official purposes" in line 14.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I rise to reserve points of order against certain items in the paragraph.

Mr. LITTLE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas will give way while the point of order is stated against the paragraph.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a point of order against the provision in the following language in lines 8, 9, and 10:

And heating apparatus for and repairs to buildings (outside of the State, War, and Navy Department Building) occupied by the War Department and its bureaus.

There is no authority of law whereby heating apparatus for and repairs to private buildings that are rented by the Government may be purchased and made. It is contrary to existing law.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. WINGO. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. I think that is not the intention of the War Department. As I recall it, the War Department is occupying several rented buildings, and under the terms of the leases they are compelled to make certain repairs on the heating apparatus. This is only to enable them to heat the buildings and do the work that may be necessary upon the heating apparatus under the terms of the deed. When the lease provides that the landlord shall make the repairs and furnish the apparatus, of course the War Department will not do it.

Mr. WINGO. What necessity is there for the War Department retaining these buildings? They can get releases from their leases now very easily. The owners of the buildings would be very glad to take the buildings off their hands. We have vacant space galore in buildings owned by the Government under the control of the War Department. The War Department can surrender every private building they have now and the owners will be glad to relieve them, because they can rent them for two or three times what the War Department is paying now. Why should we keep up these buildings for these private owners when we have space not being used, owned by the Government?

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is mistaken about that, unless the committee having charge of the matter is mistaken, because they say that there is no space available now for some of the departments that are obliged to go out and rent others.

Mr. WINGO. The reason is this, that those who have those departments and those who are in the buildings do not want to mix them up; but if the gentleman will go to the Munitions Building and look for himself, as I have, he will find plenty of space.

Mr. GOOD. I want to say with reference to this item, that it is the identical item that was carried in the legislative bill. The legislative bill carried an appropriation of $34,229.12.

A part of that was for buildings rented prior to the war on a long-time lease that has not expired, and I do not know of a dollar that is being used of this amount with regard to the expenditures on heating. If the gentleman wants to strike it out, I have no objection.

Mr. WINGO. I will say this to the gentleman, that, of course, I do not want to cripple the War Department, but the gentleman remembers that even when the Democrats had control of the House I protested, and I shall continue to protest, as long as I am a Member of the House, against blanket lump-sum appropriations, because that is all it is; it covers everything from automobiles to soap, ice, and rent—everything—and gives the lump-sum appropriation of $400,000, which takes in files, newspapers, typewriters, furniture, ice, soap; they can do anything under the sun they want to, and I am going to keep it up. It is not an objection against any particular branch. Gentlemen talk about a budget system. If you want a budget system, we have got to say to the executive departments: Itemize your accounts when you bring them before the Congress, and then Congress may determine. Do not include in one paragraph everything from soap and ice to automobiles. I am going to insist on the point of order, so as to enforce the giving of proper estimates.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, it is not subject to the point of order. It is the same item in which this appropriation has been carried for years. To-day there is a deficiency in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army, all of which has been expended for the purchase of steel file cases. Gen. Pershing wired before he left France to The Adjutant General to prepare a large number of steel file cases, so that he could have the assorting made to place in those file cases certain correspondence in regard to the Expeditionary Forces. The files are coming in, some permanent requests for files from the draft boards. There is no place and there must be some filing facilities furnished them, and over $300,000 of this amount is for the purchase of these file cases.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa state any statutory authority for making appropriations for "repairs to buildings—outside of the State, War, and Navy Department Buildings—occupied by the War Department and its bureaus"?

Mr. WINGO. There is no authority of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was asking the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. That is carried in the appropriation bill for this year.

Mr. WINGO. That does not make it law.

Mr. GOOD. There is a provision for the purchase of scientific books, law books, blank books, newspapers, periodicals, maps, typewriters, adding machines, furniture and repairs to same, filing cases, towels, ice, and so forth, and heating apparatus for and repairs to buildings, outside of the State, War, and Navy Department Building. That has been carried in the bill for 10 or 12 years to my knowledge. Now, as to whether there is any law the burden is on the gentleman making the point of order, according to the ruling of the Chair for a number of years, to show there is not permanent law for the provision carried in the bill. The burden of proof is on the side making the point of order and not on the committee reporting the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Arkansas states there is no statutory authority, and no statutory authority has been shown to the Chair as yet for this appropriation.

Mr. GOOD. Has the statute been shown to the Chair with regard to the rental of buildings for the War Department and the application of the lessor and the lessee under that authority——

The CHAIRMAN. The only authority that has been cited to the Chair is that in the appropriation bill, and, of course, that is not statutory authority.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, may I say just a word on the subject of the parliamentary status as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa? The burden is not on the Member who makes the point of order on an item in an appropriation bill. It has been most emphatically decided that when a point of order is made to an item on an appropriation bill the burden is on the proponent to sustain the proposition objected to.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, the burden of proof is on the gentleman presenting the bill to show the authority for the item to which the point of order is directed.

Mr. GOOD. Unquestionably; and I do not think the gentleman from Arkansas will take issue with the statement that the War Department has authority to rent buildings and to occupy them, and with that authority is carried the authority incident to the occupation. If heat is not furnished, why, of course, the War Department would have to furnish the heat. It has been in pursuance of that the general authority to rent buildings by the War Department that this language has been carried, and an objection has never been made in regard to it.

Mr. WINGO. The courts have held that the word "repairs" might include a new construction added onto the building. Would the gentleman say that because under the current appropriation, and that is all it is, we give authority to rent, and the War Department agrees that if they rented for a period of years the War Department would tear down a building or add a new building or——

Mr. GOOD. Well, that question would never get to the courts——

Mr. WINGO. Not so far as the Federal Government is concerned; but the word "repairs" has been considered by the courts and its meaning defined.

Now, will the gentleman permit me right there? If the gentleman will insert an item for filing cases for Gen. Pershing, I shall not object. This is a rental item. If he comes in with an item for filing cases for the Expeditionary Forces, I shall not object to that. But here is a blanket appropriation that has been carried as a current appropriation and is not under existing statute. I have not been able to find any law that authorizes the War Department to make repairs on a building that is rented.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that there is authority for the War Department to rent buildings, and under that general authority they have rented buildings. They have from time immemorial under that item done things incident to the occupation of a rented building. But I will say to the gentleman not a penny of this amount of $400,000 was estimated for this purpose at all. Practically all of it is for filing cases and devices of that kind.

Mr. WINGO. Why did not the gentleman put in an item that the House could understand, such as filing cases for the records of the American Expeditionary Forces and, if you want, rental for safe quarters for the same?

Mr. GOOD. It is paid out of the contingent fund of the War Department, and the committee did not want to start another fund down there with a bureau chief over it and with a whole lot of clerks to keep books. This is a contingent-fund item, and that is the same language that it has been carried in for years. I submit it is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made to the language:

Heating apparatus for and repairs to buildings (outside of the State, War, and Navy Department Building) occupied by the War Department and its bureaus.

In the view of the Chair this calls for the expenditure of money upon other than Government property, and unless there is statutory authority for such an expenditure of money, that language, in the opinion of the Chair, is subject to a point of order, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Just what language goes out?

The CHAIRMAN. The language in line 8, beginning with the word "and," down to and including the word "bureaus," in line 10, page 9.

Mr. GOOD. Does the Chair mean to say that out of this appropriation no money can be paid for fuel and heat for Government buildings that are to be taken under a lease where the War Department agrees to heat the building?

Mr. WINGO. "Fuel and gas" did not go out, but the "heating apparatus." You can not buy new apparatus in the rental of a new building.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Chair indulge me for a single word? This is for contingent expenses. Now, then, we have fallen into the habit of adding much language that might all go out, and which is appropriate under the words "contingent expenses." Now, what is the exception? "And heating apparatus for and repairs to buildings—outside of the State, War, and Navy Department Building—occupied by the War Department and its bureaus." Now, all understand that the State, War, and Navy Building is the building just beyond the White House.

We all know, as a matter of fact, that the War Department occupies buildings down on the Mall. There must be heating and lighting and care for the buildings that are occupied outside whether rented or owned by the Government. A lease by the Government is a temporary ownership, and I apprehend—in fact, I am sure—that if a lease was made by the Government of a building for a year or for 10 years, and I have no doubt there are many such leases, unless it can be paid for as contingent expenses you could not either heat or light them.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I think there is one matter that the attention of the Chair ought to be called to, and the gentleman's remarks suggested it.

The Government owns the old Ford Theater. That is not a part of the State, War, and Navy Department Building at all, but it is occupied by the War Department. It pays for repairs to this building, and if it has a heating apparatus it comes out of that. The Government occupies other buildings of its own, and the repair and upkeep is paid out of the contingent fund of the War Department. This item goes out. I observe there is an estimate here for typewriters, furniture, and so forth. I do not know to what extent that relates to Government-owned buildings, but I want to call the attention of the Chair to this, and I should have called his attention to it before, that a part of these buildings are Government-owned buildings, and certainly the Government has the right to bear the expense of heating apparatus in its own buildings, even though occupied by the War Department.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I might say in regard to the point of order that I had a lawsuit on this once, and the courts have long since decided that a man who rents a building does not have to repair it; and the Government does not have to repair this. It seems very easy to spend money and very hard to save a little. The Lord knows, I am starting out to give you a chance to save little enough. It is a very small item, but it is a large principle.

There has been a good deal of oratory this afternoon, as I started to say, about saving money. I read here, and I will move to cut it out, an appropriation "for the operation of one motor-propelled, passenger-carrying vehicle, to be used only for official purposes." Now, when this appropriation was made, the War Department originally figured how many automobiles they should have, but it appears somebody was overlooked. In the old appropriation bills of this House years ago there were appropriations for horses and vehicles for Congressmen. There are none now. If you need to go to the War Department on the business of your constituents you have to pay your fare. This appropriation gives $1,000 for car fare for the War Department. And why on earth do they want that one other motor-propelled vehicle? A Congressman is liable to be run down now most any day by an automobile run by a fellow with shoulder straps who should be in his office at work. I am sick and tired of this business. There is a principle involved here, and it is time for you to put your foot down. I greatly hate to criticize, but think we ought to do a little work along the line of economy. Gentlemen, our people work hard to supply the funds that run our Government. They do not make their sacrifices so military men who never fought can have automobiles await their beck and nod.

The committee has done some splendid work for economy, work which I have admired greatly, and I commend them for it. They have done such a lot of hard work that I think they will be glad to have a little help in the line of economy.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I can not yield now. Here is a principle. Why not say to the War Department, "There are thirty billions of debt hanging over this country. We want you to begin retrenching, and when you want to go round the corner you will have to walk." A lot of our people will have to walk if they keep on paying taxes as they have been doing recently. Here is a good place to draw the line. We could not set a better precedent to the War Department than to say, "Gentlemen, this must stop. We were willing to spend money like water during the war, but what is the use in buying or maintaining these machines?" They have already all the machines they need. What business has anybody in the War Department to have a machine, anyway? If you want to see any of them, you must go down there and hunt them up. That is their place. Let them stay there. There are miles of machines parked down there now. You can find machines costing the very highest price often standing there ready to bring men in uniform to dinner.

Gentlemen, be true to your oratory. If gentlemen who have spoken here in the last hour will stay with me, we will carry this amendment. This in itself is a small matter, and therefore it is easy here to draw the line. But there is principle involved. This money has got to be paid by the taxpayers. Here is a mighty easy place to stop. If you will now notify them that they must descend to earth again, must walk or ride on street cars, you will begin to get the idea into the heads of the War Department that money costs money.

Mr. CANNON. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. LITTLE. My motion is to strike out the provision there in line 13, giving somebody another automobile in which to parade around town. I do not see any reason for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LITTLE: Page 9, line 13, strike out all of line 13 and the words "only for official purposes" in line 14.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we can agree as to time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to have three minutes.

Mr. GOOD. I ask unanimous consent that the debate close in 11 minutes, 3 minutes to be used by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], 3 minutes by my colleague [Mr. GREEN], and——

Mr. WINGO. Debate on this amendment?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I want three minutes. I may not use it.

Mr. LITTLE. Reserving the right to object, I would like to make a formal motion.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman has made his motion.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; but I would like to make another.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HAUGEN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. REAVIS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all certain that the information I have in mind is pertinent to this amendment, because I am not sure that the motor vehicles now controlled and owned by the War Department could be used for the purposes for which the one herein provided for is required.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that a car is not required here at all.

Mr. REAVIS. The item says, "And one motor-propelled, passenger-carrying vehicle, to be used only for official purposes."

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman what I explained before. The committee has done what it has done for 20 years. In reporting deficiency bills the custom is to carry the deficiency in the exact language of the former appropriation, and so we simply use that language and put in the amount of deficiency. That is the reason why this appears here.

Mr. REAVIS. What I have in mind was this: I do not know whether this deficiency appropriation is to be utilized for the purpose of purchasing an automobile or not, but I do know that the War Department now has 47,000 surplus automobiles. I know that the War Department has received from the factories since the signing of the armistice automobiles aggregating in value approximately $175,000,000, and that within an hour's ride of Washington are new Cadillacs, Dodges, Buicks, Chandlers, and Hudsons that are piled five high in the crates from which they have never been taken, covering acres of ground. I know that the War Department has many thousands of motor vehicles that have been standing from November until September in open storage, with no covering on them, until the upholstering has rotted, until the tops have rotted and fallen, and until the radiators are so covered with rust that you can scarcely see the enamel; that from November last until September this year no cars have been sold, although Gen. Drake, Chief of the Motor Transport Corps, testified that he had issued 472 orders to the sale department which declared the vehicles surplus and authorized their sale.

It seems to me, gentlemen, that if the War Department has a surplus of 47,000 cars, many of which have never been taken from the crates, thousands of which have been standing in the open for nearly 11 months, it is a good deal of effrontery for it to come in here and ask this Congress to appropriate money to enable them to buy one more.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I submit to the gentleman that this language, as clearly as the English language can express it, provides for the maintenance, repair, and operation of motor trucks and motor cycles and of one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle. It provides for maintenance and operation. It does not provide for purchase, and every bill that has ever provided for the purchase of an automobile specifically provides for the purchase of a motor-propelled vehicle.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there? I will state that——

Mr. REAVIS. In line 10 this language is called to my attention: "Purchase and exchange of motor trucks and motor cycles."

Mr. WINGO. And a semicolon. I have an amendment at the desk to strike that out. It is an amendment different from that of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. REAVIS. I stated at the beginning of my remarks that I was not at all certain that the information I had in mind was applicable to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas. I sought this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to make this statement when we were all talking economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended five minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman three minutes of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The other day I received a letter from the sales department, giving notice of the fact that several hundred unserviceable cars were to be placed on sale throughout the country. Some two or three months ago I took up with the department the possible sale of some of these cars that the gentleman has mentioned, and was informed that those cars were not for sale and were not going to be sold. Several requests in writing had come in to know when the War Department was going to place these cars on sale, saying that the automobile factories could not turn out certain makes of cars except on a wait of three or four months, and wondering if they could get the new cars that the War Department had in storage.

Mr. REAVIS. I do not know whether the War Department is going to sell them or not, but in the immediate future the committee of which I am a member will bring into the House a report as to the condition which now exists and to ascertain whether or not Congress will take action on the conduct of the War Department in holding for 11 months millions of dollars' worth of automobiles that are rotting and rusting and going to ruin, notwithstanding Gen. Drake, Chief of the Motor Transport Corps, a most excellent officer and a very frank witness, testified that 470 communications had gone from his office to the sales department of the War Department, pleading for and ordering the sale of these machines, and he said that notwithstanding that fact not one of them has been sold.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] has criticized the War Department for its failure to dispose of these automobiles. The gentleman from Nebraska is no doubt aware of the fact that Congress passed a statute which authorized the Secretary of War to transfer these motor trucks to certain departments of the Government, and that the Secretary of War has doubtful authority, in the face of that statute, to make a sale of these motor trucks.

The provision in the Public Health Service act, section 3 of the act of March 3, 1919, says:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to transfer without charge to the Secretary of the Treasury, for the use of the Public Health Service, such hospital furniture and equipment, including hospital and medical supplies, motor trucks, and other motor-driven vehicles, in good condition, not required by the War Department, as may be required by the Public Health Service for its hospitals.

There is also a similar provision of law as to the Post Office Department. The provision contained in the Post Office appropriation act reads as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture all available war material, equipment, and supplies not needed for the purposes of the War Department but suitable for use in the improvement of highways, and that the same be distributed among the highway departments of the several States to be used on roads constructed in whole or in part by Federal aid, such distribution to be made upon the value basis of distribution, the same as provided by the Federal aid road act approved July 11, 1916: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, at his discretion, may reserve from such distribution not to exceed 10 per cent of such material, equipment, and supplies for use in the construction of national-forest roads or other roads constructed under his direct supervision.

Col. Ritchie stated that the Agricultural Department alone has requisitioned 27,982 motor vehicles of various kinds, and I take it that the Secretary of War does not wish to sell these vehicles until he knows how many will be required by the departments. If they can be made useful in the building of highways, then they should be so used.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. REAVIS. Following the passage of that statute in March, the same Congress in July passed a statute providing that no more of these motor vehicles should be turned over to the departments without full compensation. The Judge Advocate General issued an opinion upon the July law, stating that there was no authority on the part of the department to turn over any more of these motor vehicles to the departments unless they paid for them, but subsequent to the rendering of that opinion, as late as August, the Secretary of War issued an order turning over all motor vehicles for which orders had gone out. In violation of that law, and in contemptuous disregard of Congress, he turned over to these departments approximately $163,000.000 worth of motor vehicles without the payment of a dollar.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The amendment to which the gentleman refers was included in the sundry civil bill. The provision contained in the sundry civil appropriation act approved July 9, 1919, section 5, reads as follows:

The Secretary of War is authorized to transfer any unused and surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment of any kind, the payment for same to be made as provided herein, to any branch of the Government service having appropriations available for the purchase of said vehicles and equipment: Provided, That in case of the transfers herein authorized a reasonable price not to exceed actual cost, and if the same have been used, at a reasonable price based upon length of usage, shall be determined upon and an equivalent amount of each appropriation available for said purchase shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt, and the appropriation in each case reduced accordingly: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of each official of the Government having such purchases in charge to procure the same from any such unused or surplus stock if possible: Provided further, That hereafter no transfer of motor-propelled vehicles, and motor equipment, unless specifically authorized by law, shall be made free of charge to any branch of the Government service.

Of course, I do not know what action the Secretary of War has taken since that provision was passed. I assume that the gentleman is fully acquainted with the facts; but I rose for the purpose of saying that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] has criticized the War Department for its failure to sell these automobiles, when, as a matter of fact, there is a statute now on the books which authorizes him not to sell them, but on the contrary to turn them over to the departments, and in pursuance of that statute he has transferred to the Public Health Service 720 vehicles. He has transferred to the Post Office Department 4,888 vehicles, and he has transferred more than 5,200 to the Agricultural Department.

The Judge Advocate General construed these enactments, and I quote from his opinion:

It is the opinion of this office that so far as the previous statutes, enumerated and quoted from, specifically authorize the transfer of motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to be made free of charge to other branches of the Government service, they are not repealed, but that so far as they do not specifically authorize such transfer of such vehicles or equipment to be made free of charge, such statutes are superseded.

Measured by this rule, the provisions quoted relating to the transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture of all available war material, equipment, and supplies not needed for the purposes of the War Department, is repealed so far as inconsistent with the later act, inasmuch as it neither specifically mentions motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment nor specifically authorizes a transfer free of charge.

It is the opinion of this office that the other two statutes referred to, namely, the act of March 3, 1919 (40 Stat., 1303), directing the transfer without charge, for the use of the Public Health Service, of motor trucks and other motor-driven vehicles not required by the War Department and the act of July 2, 1918 (40 Stat., 753), authorizing the transfer to the Postmaster General, without charge, of such automobiles or parts thereof as may prove to be or shall become unsuitable for the purposes of the War Department, both specifically authorized the transfer of motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to be made free of charge to other branches of the Government service, and are not repealed, but that transfers of motor vehicles to the last two named services may continue to be made without charge.

It will thus be seen that the Judge Advocate General expressly ruled that these vehicles may be transferred to the Public Health Service and the Post Office Department without charge and notwithstanding the aforesaid provision in the sundry civil bill; and the statute passed by Congress directs such transfer to be made. I do not wish to take issue with the Judge Advocate General, but it would seem that the same reasoning would apply to the Agricultural Department, for in my opinion motor trucks can be included in the war equipment and material referred to in the statute.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield briefly.

Mr. REAVIS. I want to make this statement, that I had in mind the order to the department to turn these over. The sworn testimony of the Chief of the Motor Transport Service, Gen. Drake, is that they have 47,000 surplus automobiles over and above the requirements of the departments, and the 47,000 surplus automobiles that I had in mind are automobiles with which the other departments, under the law, have nothing to do.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, in regard to the manner in which these cars are being stored. Col. Ritchie was asked the direct question as to what steps were being taken to preserve these automobiles and trucks.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In a few minutes I will yield. I quote the following from the hearings before the committee. Col. Ritchie was asked this question:

A Member of Congress told me night before last that he had been over there and that he has a picture of them, and that a moving-picture man had gone there to get a picture of them, and that he saw cars there with the bodies taken off and the vehicles big boxes of rust.

Col. RITCHIE. I can not answer that except to say that the last time I was at Relay, Md., two months ago, they had sufficient covered storage to take care of all the vehicles at that time at Relay, and the vehicles there then consisted only of Ford touring cars and Commerce chassis.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps I am referring to another place. You have another place near Baltimore where you have a large number of trucks?

Col. RITCHIE. The Motor Transport Corps has.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is that?

Col. RITCHIE. That is at Camp Holabird.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about that?

Col. RITCHIE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are those out in the open?

Col. RITCHIE. Yes, sir; but they are all in such shape that they are not deteriorating; they are properly slushed and greased.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I suggest right there, Mr. Chairman, that a Member of Congress called my attention to the fact the other day that he had a letter from a resident of Relay, Md., in which this resident wrote this Congressman that he personally knew it to be a fact that there were 25,000 vehicles at Relay, Md., between 20,000 and 25,000 at Camp Meade, Md., which is toward Annapolis from Baltimore, and that there were at least 100,000 in open storage at Camp Holabird, which is the Motor Transport Corps general supply depot, supplying the Eastern and Northeastern Departments.

I went back to the office, and in order to obtain this information had a statement of all the vehicles gotten up for me and furnished to him. That statement shows that there were about 12,000 vehicles at Camp Holabird, that there were between seven and eight hundred motor vehicles at Relay, Md., which had been transferred by the Motor Transport Corps to the Post Office Department. Those vehicles were absolutely under the control of the Post Office Department. We have no longer anything to do with them. There are at Camp Meade, where he said there were between twenty and twenty-five thousand vehicles, 170 vehicles in all, including motor cycles and bicycles. There were at Camp Holabird between eleven and twelve thousand vehicles.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield to me further for a statement?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In just a moment.

Mr. REAVIS. The statement of the witness that there are between 11,000 and 12,000 automobiles at Camp Holabird is correct. There are approximately 11,000 cars there, but the statement that they are protected is incorrect. There are 3,700 trucks at Camp Holabird, many of them with the beds or bodies off and with all their parts exposed to the snows of winter and the rains of summer, and anyone who says they have not deteriorated certainly has not seen them. I saw them day before yesterday.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question in the time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. What reason is given why these cars are not sold?

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me to answer the question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. I have so far not found out. Gen. Drake, the Chief of the Motor Transport Corps, took out 500 passenger cars, what they call pleasure cars—I saw Hudson limousines and Packards and other standard cars—in February of this year and parked them, and he notified the sales department that they were surplus and should be sold. In the latter part of July, after receiving 470 orders and communications from Gen. Drake, the sales department, under charge of a Mr. Hutchinson, sent all of the orders back and said he wanted nothing to do with it. Mr. Hutchinson, at the head of that department, was the general manager of the Willys-Overland Automobile Co. before he took that job, and not one of those cars has been sold.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In further answer to the gentleman from Texas I wish to read the statement of Mr. Phillips, which was made before the committee, with reference to just why these cars have not been put in storage.

Mr. REAVIS. Who is Mr. Phillips, may I ask the gentleman?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Phillips appeared with Col. Ritchie and is connected with the motor equipment. He is a civilian, and, I think, in direct charge of this matter under that officer.

Mr. REAVIS. I will state to the gentleman, if I may interrupt him, that the two men in charge are Gen. Drake, Chief of the Motor Transport Corps, and Mr. Hutchinson, who has charge of the department of sales.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand that, but Mr. Phillips, who is a civilian, is directly connected with this matter under these officers. Mr. Phillips stated, in response to a question of the chairman, which was as follows:

> I understood you to say that you have a large number of War Department machines at Relay?
> Mr. PHILLIPS. Those are all machines that have been transferred to the Post Office Department. By the way, Mr. Chairman, may I say that, as far as that open storage is concerned at Camp Holabird, you probably know that a provision in the Army appropriation act prevented us from going ahead with construction for storage purposes at Holabird, as it did at other camps. All of our construction was stopped——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

My BYRNS of Tennessee (reading)—

> We intended to put up some more storage facilities at Holabird, but we are absolutely prohibited from doing that under the provisions of that appropriation act. We are absolutely prohibited from putting up any construction at all.

Mr. GARNER. That does not answer the question as to why they did not sell these vehicles.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are prohibited under the statute from selling them.

Mr. GARNER. If they are prohibited by law, that settles it.

Mr. REAVIS. Under what statute?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The statute which directed the Secretary of War to turn them over to the departments.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman is mistaken, because there are 47,000 cars over and above the demands of the departments.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I think the gentleman is mistaken when he says they are prohibited under the statutes from selling them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are prohibited this far, at least. The Secretary of War was authorized to turn over to the Agricultural Department such machines as it needed for highway purposes, and directed to make transfers to the Public Health Service and the Post Office Department, and certainly the Secretary of War is not at liberty, under the statute, to sell these machines until he is advised that these departments will not need them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have allowed this debate to run along too long now. It is getting far afield from the appropriation. I shall object to any remarks that are not on the item under discussion.

Mr. GARNER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] may have three minutes. I think here is a good opportunity for Congress to ascertain whether or not there is a law on the statute books prohibiting the sale of these automobiles.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, if there is a law on the statute books prohibiting the sale of these automobiles or trucks the sooner we know it the better, and there must be then some law passed authorizing the sale of them. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] contends that there is no law upon the statute books, and that is the construction of the War Department, saying that they are not allowed to sell these automobiles. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] contend that they are permitted to sell these automobiles.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARNER. Just a moment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Let me correct my friend. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes—oh, never mind.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the rest of the three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, let me make this statement and then I will yield if I have any time. The first law that was passed was in the Post Office appropriation bill in March, that authorized the War Department to turn over to other governmental departments such motor vehicles as they needed. That is not the exact language, but that is the purport of the law. These other departments made requisition on the War Department for their needs in motor-propelled vehicles, and after all their needs were taken into account there were 47,000 surplus cars.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. According to the testimony of Gen. Drake, Chief of the Motor Transport Corps, given before my committee on the second of this month——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, there is a statement to be found on page 843, inserted at the request of the chairman, which shows the total number of cars in the United States is only 40,000; that they have already authorized 15,000, and that they have requisitions for further requirements amounting to 24,000, taking up every car.

Mr. REAVIS. When was that statement made?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In the last week.

Mr. REAVIS. I think the automobiles now in the United States in charge of the War Department—I can not give the exact figures—are in excess of 100,000.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The number here given is 40,052.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I will.

Mr. FESS. If there is no authority to sell these cars, what about this announcement of the War Department of September 10, 1919, which says:

> The director of sales announced that the Motor Transport Corps will offer for sale at public auctions to be held in the immediate future at Army camps and storage yards enumerated in the appended list the total of 1,243 used passenger cars, trucks, ambulances, motorcycles, side cars, and bicycles—

And so forth.

Mr. REAVIS. The reading of that answers the inquiry.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to agree upon the time for closing debate upon this amendment. I understand that there is another amendment to be offered.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I want to ask the gentleman from Nebraska a question in this connection.

Mr. GOOD. I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment be closed in five minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Would the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa that all debate upon the pending amendment close at the expiration of five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this is my question in connection with the matter that has been discussed. The gentleman from Tennessee states that the War Department offers as a reason why they do not sell these automobiles, that they have been forbidden by statute to do so, and when asked to give the statute to that effect, we are referred to the provision in existing law authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over certain surplus trucks, and other material, suitable for road-making purposes to the Department of Agriculture to be divided between the road departments of the several States. Now I understand that the Secretary of Agriculture is having difficulty in securing this material from the War Department, that department claiming that it has no authority to turn over these vehicles for apportionment between the States.

Mr. GOOD. I can not give the gentleman all of my five minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not desire further time, but conclude my inquiry by asking on what ground is it that the Secretary of War declines to execute the authority heretofore given him by Congress to turn over the above material to the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. GOOD. Under the Post Office appropriation act the Secretary of War was directed and authorized at his discretion to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture all available war material, equipment, supplies, including war supplies, not needed for the purpose of the War Department and suitable for the purpose of improving the highways, and subsequently the sundry civil bill provided that the Secretary of War was authorized to transfer any unused and surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment of any kind, and payment for the same to be made as provided therein, to any branch of the Government service, and so forth. Now, the Comptroller of the Treasury has held that inasmuch as the sundry civil bill passed subsequent to the enactment of the Post Office appropriation bill, and inasmuch as the language authorizing the transfer in the Post Office appropriation bill was general and the requirement for payment when transfers were made was in the sundry civil bill, that the provisions of the sundry civil bill suspended the provisions in the Post Office bill so far as motor-propelled vehicles were concerned, and that payment would have to be made. Notwithstanding that after Gen. Drake held that they could not transfer without, I understand that about 11,000 automobiles and trucks were transferred. I think the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee draws an unwarranted conclusion from this. Now, I want to come to the question of the motion of the gentleman from Kansas. It will be noticed that this provision for $1,000 is for the maintenance, repair, and operation of motor trucks and motor cycles and one motor-propelled, passenger-carrying vehicle, to be used only for official purposes.

Now, it is estimated that they have in the War Department in Washington five motor trucks. The Secretary of War does have a passenger-carrying car, and this appropriation could be used for the maintenance of that car, and I submit that there is not a provision in this bill to take from the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Agriculture, from the Vice President, or the Speaker of this House the provision for the maintenance of his car; and the Secretary of War is entitled to just as much consideration as any other Secretary or member of the President's Cabinet. While I believe in cutting down these appropriations, let us do it in a spirit of justice to the department. This provision is carried here because it is in the general language of the appropriation. There are five of these trucks carrying mail and things of that kind between the department and various buildings of the War Department. They must be maintained. I would not object in the least having the provision for purchase and exchange of motor trucks and motor cycles go out, because I do not believe that the War Department intends to spend a dollar for the purchase of them. They should not purchase any for several years. I do not believe that it will expend anything for such purpose, because they have them to sell, and they have more than are needed. That language, as I said before, is carried only because it has been the custom from time immemorial to carry the regular provision of law making appropriations for deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired; and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WINGO: Page 9, lines 10 and 11, strike out the following words: "Purchase and exchange of motor trucks and motor cycles."

Mr. GOOD. There is no objection to that.

Mr WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman has conceded that, and I only desire to say a word. As I understood the colloquy between the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Iowa, the gentleman from Tennessee says that the War Department contends that it has not authority to sell these trucks. The gentleman from Iowa contends that is a construction of the law. Now, be that as it may, I think it is not good common horse sense for Congress to twiddle over the interpretation of the present existing statutes. If they have the trucks, if the statement of reputable witnesses are true, that they have trucks and automobiles they do not need, then, if they contend that they have not got authority of law, for God's sake let us give them authority and let them sell them instead of letting them go to waste. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I agree with the gentleman that these automobiles and motor cycles ought to be sold. The gentleman referred to my contention. What I wanted to say was this, that Congress has passed a statute which directed the Secretary of War to furnish these motor trucks to the Agricultural Department for highway purposes. In view of that statute, it was my contention that the Secretary of War no doubt felt he had no authority to sell cars which the Department of Agriculture might need.

Mr. WINGO. I have no quarrel with the gentleman's contention.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. GARNER. I wish to say that in conference with a member of the Military Affairs Committee a few moments ago—the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]—it was stated that the testimony before the Military Committee was that they had full power to sell these cars.

Mr. WINGO. We have a confused contention. The people of the country have read statements about these trucks, and they believe these things are going to waste. Now, if it be true, why can not the Congress, through a committee having jurisdiction, bring in a resolution here authorizing and directing the War Department to immediately sell surplus trucks and relieve this scandal, because it has grown to be a scandal?

Mr. GOOD. I want to say to the gentleman that I do not see what better language we could enact than that in the appropriation provision:

Sale of war supplies: That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized, through the head of any executive department, to sell, upon such terms as the head of such department shall deem expedient, to any person, partnership, association, corporation, or any other department of the Government, or to any foreign State or Government, engaged in war against any Government with which the United States is at war, any war supplies, material and equipment, and any by-products thereof, and any building, plant, or factory, acquired since April 6, 1917, including the lands upon which the plant or factory may be situated, for the production of such war supplies, materials, and equipment which, during the present emergency, may have or may hereafter be purchased or acquired or manufactured by the United States.

Mr. WINGO. Was that before or after the passage of the sundry civil act that the gentleman read a while ago?

Mr. GOOD. The passage of that act only provided they should not give them away.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. GOOD. It was before, of course.

Mr. WINGO. All right. Now, the gentleman is a lawyer. I think there is something in the War Department contention that in the effort to protect the public interest we have three different statutes here which possibly conflict and evidently confuse. Now, let us stop disputing what the law is. We all agree that they ought to sell these surplus cars and trucks. Let the proper committee bring in a resolution here authorizing and directing the War Department to sell these surplus motor vehicles.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, this is——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that millions and hundreds of millions of dollars are involved in the matter, and we can afford to spend five minutes. Every Member seems to be of the opinion that these automobiles should be disposed of. In view of the fact that the gentleman says that the President has authority and that the President neglected to use it, let us direct it to be done.

Mr. GOOD. That is not the amendment before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GOOD. The chairman has accepted the amendment before the House.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to offer an amendment right there that I would like two or three minutes to explain.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to closing the debate in 15 minutes?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will have to object if it includes all the amendments.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas had five minutes yielded, did he not?

Mr. WINGO. Was that agreed to?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas may have five additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, is that to be taken out of the 20 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I object to that. The time was fixed at 20 minutes.

Mr. WINGO. I think it was fixed with the understanding that that question was pending. I have not taken up the time. We are getting down to a discussion here that I think will be profitable.

Mr. GOOD. I have no objection to the gentleman having five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. I will do this: I am going to offer an amendment directing and authorizing the sale of these surplus trucks in order to shut this off.

Mr. REAVIS. I do not want to take any further time on this, but merely in response to what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] says I have prepared an amendment along the line he has just suggested. But there is no confusion on the part of the War Department in reference to their right regarding the disposal of these automobiles. While none of these machines have been sold or offered for sale, we started the investigation of these automobiles largely at Camp Holabird and at Camp Jessup, at Atlanta, Ga. They are scattered all over the country, so far as that is concerned. Gen. Drake testified—I think it was on the afternoon of the 2d of September, the 2d of this month—that he had done everything in his power to get the sales department to have Mr. Hutchinson sell these automobiles, but he could not get even a reply to his correspondence nor any action upon his order, and that in the month of July, after he had been issuing orders to them and notifying them of it for 11 months, the sales department returned all his orders and his correspondence to him and stated they wanted nothing to do with it.

Now, with reference to whether or not there is confusion among the various statutes that we have passed regarding these automobiles, since these statements have been made, since the 2d of September, when Gen. Drake, the Chief of the Motor Transport Corps, made these statements that he could not get action through the sales department, and the committee exposed the wasteful delay, the sales department is now writing all over the country announcing that it is putting these machines on sale. There is absolutely no doubt in the mind of the War Department as to their right, their legal right, to sell these machines.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. REAVIS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUSTED. Does not the gentleman think that if the War Department had been in any doubt as to its authority to sell these cars, when there are thousands of these cars going to wrack and ruin that have cost this Government millions of dollars, the War Department could have come to Congress and asked for specific authority to sell them?

Mr. REAVIS. There is no question about that in my mind. There is no question in my mind but that the sales department is pursuing identically the policy with reference to automobiles that it pursued with reference to food. I have no question but that it will dispose of the surplus according to the circular which they issued in January, "so as not to injure industrial conditions in America."

Now, those surplus automobiles, of which the Army has no need, were not only lying in the open and rusting and rotting, but while they were in that condition and while that immense surplus was there, they permitted the same automobile manufacturers to send, for five months after the armistice, approximately $163,000,000 worth of additional new cars that have never been taken out of the crates and which are piled up five high at Camp Holabird, within 50 miles of Washington.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is it not a fact that the War Department announced the other day the sale at Camp Holabird of 100 automobiles?

Mr. REAVIS. As to the 100 automobiles that are for sale at Camp Holabird, which I saw day before yesterday, I would not give $75 for the hundred of them. Many of them are broken to pieces. Many of them have no motors in them. The glass has been broken. They have been absolutely standing out in the open since the armistice, in the weather, without anything to protect them.

Mr. BARBOUR. Has not the War Department announced sales for the 21st and 22d and 23d of automobiles at Camp Kearny, San Diego, and other camps on the Pacific coast?

Mr. REAVIS. All those announcements of sales come after the committee exposed the fact that they were not selling these automobiles. All those automobiles are what are called nonserviceable automobiles.

Mr. WINGO. Condemned and nonserviceable automobiles?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; condemned and nonserviceable automobiles.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, the War Department has furnished me with certain tabulated statements and data concerning motor vehicles held by that department. The documents show the number of such vehicles now on hand in the United States. There are no figures as to the number that were left in France. On April 15, 1919, there was reported to director of sales for disposition a surplus of 39,723 motor vehicles. This number does not include 5,382 unserviceable vehicles which were to be auctioned. But according to the data, as furnished me by Mr. Phillips who brought the information to my office, it was indicated that it was the purpose of the War Department to hold a reserve of machines until after Congress had passed upon the proposition of the department to create a standing peace Army of 509,000 men and 27,000 officers, which may never be authorized.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. The statement of Gen. Drake is that even if they had that Army they would still have 17,000 surplus.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. It is plain to be seen that no effort is being made to dispose of these vehicles; that whether there be or be not a statute authorizing the sale of the vehicles, the same is of no concern to the War Department; that it is the purpose and intention of the department to make no disposition of the vehicles, but that they will be allowed to decay or become destroyed by the operation of the elements.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is, of course, aware of the fact that every State highway department and every county highway department in the United States is asking for these trucks and motor machines for highway purposes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes; and every Congressman in this body has been besieged by letters from people in his district asking for the trucks, but the people have not been able to get them. Only a few of the trucks have been released.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They got over $12,000,000 worth the other day, according to the statement in the paper.

Mr. WINGO. What use would a highway department have for a Hudson or a Buick limousine?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The same for general purposes would be perfectly worthless and utterly worthless.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I was very much interested in the statement made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], to the effect that Gen. Drake had made the statement that in case we had an Army of 509,000 and 27,000 officers, they would still have 17,000 surplus automobiles. I gather from that that each officer in the Army is going to have an automobile. If you make the calculation suggested there, you will find that each officer will have an automobile.

Mr. REAVIS. I am not at all surprised.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The number of reservations they seek to make for the project of a new peace Army of 509,000 men and 27,000 officers would give about one machine for every 11 men.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have permission to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD the tabulated statements and data as furnished me by Mr. Phillips in connection with this matter of motor vehicles.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I subjoin the papers furnished me by Mr. Phillips, of the War Department, as follows:

MEMORANDUM FOR COL. FURLOW.

AUGUST 26, 1919.

Subject: Peace-time requirements of motor vehicles.

1. When the United States declared war on Germany there was on hand only sufficient motor vehicles for the peace-time Army as then constituted. Most of these vehicles were in use in the Southern Department and along the Mexican border. One of the lessons our Allies had learned before our entrance into the war was the fact that motor vehicles are of great importance not only for supply purposes but also for use as combat vehicles and for transportation of troops. It became necessary for provision to be made for a very large supply of motor vehicles for equipping our troops to be sent to France. This was covered in program of production instituted in June, 1917, and amended from time to time in accordance with amendments to military program. At the time of the armistice the United States Army had on hand and in production on contracts motor vehicles shown in chart attached, marked No. 76, total floated to the American Expeditionary Forces, 113,587, and total to be in the United States when production was completed, 101,225.

2. It was recommended by the Motor Transport Corps in the plan for demobilization of the Motor Transport Corps, in a memorandum to the Chief of Staff, dated November 12, 1918, that the surplus motor vehicles in France be disposed of in Europe, and that the surplus motor vehicles in this country be disposed of, first, by distribution to civil governmental organizations, such as the Post Office Department, the express company, if the same remained under governmental control, and for use in the completion of large Government projects, irrigation work, etc.; second, by sale of the property. As much of this material will be new, it should bring original cost. The number of motor vehicles to be retained is, of course, dependent on the military policy of the country, giving the size and composition of the Regular Army. This, of course, is dependent on what action Congress will take, and Congress has just commenced hearings on the proposed military policy. When the future size of the Army has been determined by Congress, a definite surplus of motor vehicles can be declared and disposed of in accordance with existing law.

3. In order to avoid keeping on hand a large surplus of motor vehicles that might deteriorate and never be used, the Secretary of War decided to retain only the amount of motor vehicles required for equipping the proposed peace-time Army of 509,000 men. This number of vehicles is shown, chart No. 159, total 47,840 vehicles of various types, ranging from bicycles to 5-ton trucks. There has been reported April 15, 1919, as surplus 39,723 vehicles, which have been reported to the Director of Sales for disposition in accordance with existing law and regulations. The following motor vehicles have been turned over: To the Post Office Department, 4,701; Public Health, 760; to Department of Agriculture, 12,832; to other departments, 682. There are now 5,382 unserviceable motor vehicles awaiting sale at auction, and these will be disposed of in the near future, authority having been granted on August 22, 1919, for the Motor Transport Corps to handle details of their disposition.

4. There are a large number of motor vehicles that are not standard military types, that are now in use at ports of debarkation, demobilization camps, supply depots, and other points which will be surplus and available for disposal when demobilization is completed, or shortly afterwards. It is believed that it would be a poor policy and a very uneconomical one to temporarily replace this nonstandard equipment with new or standard equipment, available from that retained for the 509,000-men Army, for the reason that it would involve considerable outlay for transportation charges. If the nonstandard vehicles are disposed of now, rather than later, there will be no appreciable increase in amount obtained for their sale. It is considered much more desirable to leave the new vehicles retained for the peace-time Army in storage for issue after demobilization and get as much use as possible out of the vehicles now in use that are already second-hand.

5. The motor vehicles not in use, retained for the peace-time Army, are now being stored at Camp Holabird and other motor transport general depots and Purchase, Storage and Transportation storage points. These vehicles are being properly cared for to prevent deterioration. These motor transport general depots, especially Camp Holabird, were designed and prepared for training and organizing repair organizations of the Motor Transport Corps for service in France and for crating and preparing motor vehicles and Motor Transport Corps supplies for shipment overseas. Up until November 11, 1918, every effort was made and facilities provided for storing and caring for motor vehicles in this country, it being assumed that this was a problem to be met and solved at the proper time. After the armistice preparations were made for storage facilities, but upon interpretation of the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1920 by the Judge Advocate General this work was stopped, and for this reason the best possible use had to be made of the available storage facilities.

6. Authority for sale of these vehicles has been invested in the Motor Transport Corps by an agreement entered into August 1, 1919, with the Director of Sales and approved by the Secretary of War on August 22, 1919. This action should expedite disposition of these vehicles.

7. The policy adopted retaining the amount of motor vehicles required for equipping an Army of 509,000 is necessary, logical, and in the interests of economy and for the reason that these vehicles are being properly cared for. Issues are now being made to Regular Army divisions returning from France, and in a short time the only vehicles left in storage will be the difference between the Army as now constituted and the proposed Army of 509,000, as per House resolution 14560. It is believed that had all of the motor vehicles except those required for minimum peace-time necessities been disposed of and if Congress provide for an Army of 509,000 men or less, then there would be a basis for considerable criticism by Congress. The present Mexican situation emphasizes the importance of retaining sufficient motor vehicles for properly equipping forces required for emergencies. The use of motor vehicles for military purposes is bound to increase, and should future exigencies require the use of troops in Mexico or on the Atlantic or Pacific coasts, motor vehicles will play a very important part.

Equipment transferred to other Government activities.

NOTE.—For explanations of column headings see table preceding.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WINGO. There is one amendment pending, and the debate has been limited on that.

Mr. TINCHER. I have drawn this amendment at the request of my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY]. I will ask that it be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have his amendment reported for the information of the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TINCHER: After line 17, page 9, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For the purchase of bridge across Missouri River connecting the two portions of the United States military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., $35,000."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was simply read for the information of the committee. It is not yet offered.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I have drawn this amendment at the request of my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY], who is compelled to be absent from the House to-day. The bridge sought to be purchased connects the Missouri side with the Kansas side of the Government-owned land at the Federal penitentiary. As I understand it, there are a thousand acres on the Missouri side of the river. This bridge belongs to a private corporation. During the war the Government spent some considerable money in reconstructing the bridge, and up until the time the armistice was signed it looked as though they were going to have to pay some $160,000 to procure title to the bridge. Now the Secretary of War has agreed to settle with the owners of the bridge for $35,000. It will give them the use of this 1,000 acres of land. To purchase an equal amount of land on the Kansas side would cost, perhaps, $300 an acre. The Secretary of War has written to the chairman of the committee. There seems to have been some misunderstanding about it, and he asks that the appropriation be made, and that they be allowed to pay for the bridge, so that they may use the land on the Missouri side in their agricultural work in connection with the penitentiary. I hope the gentleman will not make a point of order, because I do not think there should be any contest about it.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I would like to have considered as pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REAVIS: Page 9, line 19, after the period add the following:

"The Secretary of War is hereby directed to sell all surplus motor vehicles now in the War Department."

Mr. GOOD. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. REAVIS. I do not care to debate it further. I have stated my views.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by incorporating the statute with reference to the sale of motor trucks and the decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury thereon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the statute with reference to the sale of motor trucks and the decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury thereon. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for a vote on my amendment, which the chairman of the committee says he is willing to have adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. GOOD. May we have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WINGO: Page 9, lines 10 and 11, strike out the following words:

"Purchase and exchange of motor trucks and motor cycles."

Mr. GOOD. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] has offered an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TINCHER: After line 17, page 9, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For the purchase of bridge across Missouri River connecting the two portions of the United States military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., $35,000."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina makes a point of order against the amendment. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to be heard on the amendment?

Mr. TINCHER. I think the amendment is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have my amendment voted on.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I would like to offer an amendment to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], to which a point of order is pending.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I offer my amendment subject to the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report. Is this offered as a substitute for the amendment or to follow it?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It is an amendment to the amendment. I offer it to follow the language just read, as a proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia: At the end of the amendment offered by Mr. REAVIS insert: "Provided not required to enable the Secretary of War to execute the authority afforded by section 7 of the act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920."

Mr. GOOD. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. My amendment was offered subject to the point of order. I wish to say just a word or two in this connection. In the act referred to, which was the Post Office act, the House included this provision:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture all available war material, equipment, and supplies not needed for the purposes of the War Department but suitable for use in the improvement of highways, and that the same be distributed among the highway departments of the several States to be used on roads constructed in whole or in part by Federal aid, such distribution to be made upon the value basis of distribution, the same as provided by the Federal aid road act approved July 11, 1916: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, at his discretion, may reserve from such distribution not to exceed 10 per cent of such material, equipment, and supplies for use in the construction of national forest roads or other roads constructed under his direct supervision.

I believe that provision, affecting as it did every State in the Union, received the assent of every member of every delegation of every State, when it was under consideration by the House. Subsequent to the passage of the above act, including the provision cited, the sundry civil appropriation bill was enacted containing the following provision:

The Secretary of War is authorized to transfer any unused and surplus motor-propelled vehicles, and motor equipment of any kind, payment for same to be made as provided herein, to any branch of the Government service having appropriations available for the purchase of said vehicles and equipment.

I believe it is claimed that that provision supersedes the provision contained in the Post Office appropriation bill. But to my mind this contention is not well taken. I think I would be amply able to demostrate to the House if time allowed that the two sections are perfectly harmonious and consistent.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. With pleasure.

Mr. BLACK. Certainly the gentleman is not reading all of that act, because I remember to have been here on the 1st of July, when the conference report was brought in, and the language is—unless specifically authorized by law.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. To what does the gentleman refer, the sundry civil appropriation act?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If the gentleman can find the language cited, I will be glad to have him point it out in the act.

Mr. BLACK. I do not know what the gentleman is reading from.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am reading from the sundry civil act, as given to me by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman is not reading it all, evidently.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I know nothing about the language cited by the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. I am calling attention to it, in order that the gentleman might not make an unwarranted statement——

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman point out to me the language quoted by him?

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] will point it out, because I called his attention to the fact that that would be the construction of the War Department, and it has been, and I think correctly so.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, the gentleman means the conclusion of the proviso, as follows:

That hereafter no transfer of motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment, unless specifically authorized by law, shall be made free of charge to any branch of the Government service.

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That language strengthens my contention, because the transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture was specifically authorized in the Post Office appropriation act in the language heretofore cited.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I can not yield, for lack of time. I have just made the statement that it would be easy to satisfy the House, if necessary, that the provision of the sundry civil act is not a supersession of the provision in the Post Office bill, and was never intended so to be. But be that as it may, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska so as to save for the benefit of the road department of every State in the Union, the material authorized to be turned over by the Secretary of War to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order on these amendments, I want to say just a word. There is no question in the War Department, with any officer of the War Department, but that the War Department has full authority to sell any surplus of motor-propelled vehicles. I have here before me the statement, under date of August 26, by the Chief of the Motor Transport Corps, in which it is stated:

6. Authority for the sale of these vehicles has been vested in the Motor Transport Corps by an agreement entered into August 1, 1919, with the director of sales and approved by the Secretary of War on August 22, 1919.

I think the Secretary of War should sell all of this surplus material. I have no objection to the thing being done that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] desires to have done here, but I say to the gentleman from Nebraska and the House that this is no place to do that. This is an appropriation bill. It is the duty of the Secretary to sell surplus material, and if the House wants to do as it did in the resolution directing him to sell food, I shall vote for it gladly. But, Mr. Chairman, to tie all of these things and the directions that might be necessary onto an appropriation bill it seems to me is not good behavior on our part.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the gentleman that it is not the proper way to legislate, but I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that all of the law we have on the subject of automobiles is contained in appropriation bills—the Post Office appropriation bill and the sundry civil.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska and upon the amendment offered to that amendment. It is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. REAVIS. No; I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The gentleman from Virginia offered an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska, to which a point of order was also made. The point of order to the amendment to the amendment is sustained.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to line 13, page 8, for the purpose of offering an amendment which I overlooked at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to return to page 8, offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, after line 12, insert: "American Printing House for the Blind: To enable the American Printing House for the Blind more adequately to provide books and apparatus for the education of the blind in accordance with the provisions of the act approved August 4, 1919, $30,000."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, on August 4 of this year there was approved an act authorizing the appropriation at the rate of $40,000 annual additional for the American Printing House for the Blind. It was perhaps the duty of the officer in charge of this institution to request the Secretary of the Treasury to submit estimates for this deficit. Not knowing the law with regard to it, it seems that the estimate was not sent in.

Their regular appropriation is a permanent annual appropriation and hence their attention was not called to it. My attention has been called to the fact that under this legislation for the American Printing House for the Blind to print these books there will be needed about $30,000 for the remainder of this year. Every Member of the House, as I recall, voted for the bill. After my attention was called to it, it seemed to me I ought to present an amendment so that the spirit of that law could be complied with.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS.

Transportation to China of Chinese refugees: For defraying the cost of transportation and subsistence to China of certain Chinese refugees from Mexico who have been under military jurisdiction since 1917, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $31,165.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question or two. Can the chairman inform the committee how many Chinese refugees there are?

Mr. GOOD. My recollection is that there are between four and five hundred; quite a number that came with Gen. Pershing across the line out of Mexico. Gen. Pershing felt they rendered great assistance to him in his expedition into Mexico, and they came over into Texas with him. They have been serving as cooks, and so forth, in the Army ever since. They found that they could not go back, and they ask for transportation by rail to some port, which substantially costs this amount. The original estimate was $86,000.

Mr. BARBOUR. Have they been drawing pay as cooks in the Army?

Mr. GOOD. There were 409 of them all told. I will say to the gentleman I made inquiry as to their receiving pay and was advised that they did draw pay during the time they have been serving in the Army.

Mr. BARBOUR. These Chinese are still along the Mexican border, are they?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say the reason I asked that question is that there have been quite a good many Chinese deportations, possibly not by the War Department but by some other department, in which some of the officers in charge have appointed their friends as deputies to go out, one for each two or three Chinamen, on a joy ride to the Pacific coast, and the Government paid the expenses. I am going to offer the suggestion that one good Pacific coast policeman could handle about 40 Chinamen without any difficulty.

Mr. GOOD. They will go on Army transports. They did not want to go back to China. They did not want to be compelled to go back into Mexico, because they feared they might be roughly handled. They did want to go to California——

Mr. BARBOUR. We do not want them——

Mr. GOOD. Under the law they can not live here.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. HICKS. Under what terminology are they called "refugees"? Just how are they considered refugees if they are employed in the Army?

Mr. GOOD. Well, the committee is not responsible for that term, but they followed the Army of the United States out of Mexico, where they had rendered assistance to that Army. They have been in the Army ever since. They really have no legal status in the United States, and in that sense they are refugees.

Mr. HICKS. Were they employed in the Army in Mexico?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know to what extent they were employed, only that they were employed by the Army in Mexico, but they have been employed in the Army since they came out of Mexico.

Mr. HICKS. They came out of Mexico with the Army for fear, I suppose, of the Mexicans?

Mr. GOOD. I suppose so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9205), had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence for five days was granted to Mr. HARDY of Texas on account of making some speeches.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill H. R. 8624, with Senate amendments. This is the antiprofiteering bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Friday, September 19, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, September 19, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, amid the ever-increasing responsibilities and duties of life we cling to the precious promises of Thy word. Hitherto Thy grace has been sufficient for us; Thy good will has been with us, leading us through days of danger and turmoil and strife. We still follow the light of Thy truth along the pathway that is before us. We pray that we may measure up to the added responsibilities of each day, and as men of God seek to do Thy will in us as a Nation. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

He also presented a memorial of sundry soldier patients at the Walter Reed Hospital, Washington, D. Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I present memorials signed by several hundred citizens of the State of Massachusetts of Irish descent, remonstrating against the ratification of the league covenant unless amended to secure to the United States representation equal to that of any other nation. I ask that the body of one of the petitions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petitions were ordered to lie on the table and the body of one of them was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the undersigned citizens of Massachusetts, hereby petition the Senate of the United States not to ratify the peace treaty with the covenant of the league of nations as it is now proposed. We protest against the acceptance of any league of nations—

1. Which allows any other nation to have a greater representation in any of its bodies than the United States.
2. Which allows the questions of our purely domestic concern to be passed upon by any body other than our own Government.
3. Which allows the Monroe doctrine, its interpretation, and its application to be determined by any foreign body.
4. Which deprives the Congress of these United States of its constitutional power to make war.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 56) to enable the United States to participate in the work of the International Aircraft Standards Commission, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 198) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 430) to authorize the exchange of certain lands within the Fishlake National Forest, Utah (Rept. No. 194);

A bill (S. 2758) providing for an exchange of lands between the Swan Land & Cattle Co. and the United States (Rept. No. 195); and

A bill (H. R. 1429) adding certain lands to the Idaho National Forest and the Payette National Forest, in the State of Idaho (Rept. No. 196).

LANDS AT BOULDER, COLO., FOR MUNICIPAL PURPOSES.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 6410) authorizing the city of Boulder, Colo., to purchase certain public lands, and I submit a report (No. 197) thereon.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Before consent is granted, as I was not a member of the subcommittee, will the Senator from Colorado state what the bill proposes.

Mr. THOMAS. The bill is very short and I will ask that the Secretary may read it.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not want to agree to give unanimous consent until I know what the bill is.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, I did not expect its consideration without full knowledge of what the bill contains.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Boulder, in the county of Boulder, Colo., is hereby authorized, for a period of five years from and after the passage of this act, to purchase, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to convey to said city for use in connection with the lands heretofore purchased by said city under the provisions of the act of Congress entitled, "An act to grant certain lands to the city of Boulder, Colo.," approved March 2, 1907 (34 Stat., p. 1223), for purposes of water storage and supply of its waterworks, the following described lands, to wit: The west half of section 27 and the north half of the northwest quarter of section 34, township 1 north, range 73 west, sixth principal meridian, containing 400 acres within the Colorado National Forest, or any part of said lands.

SEC. 2. That the said conveyance shall be made upon the payment by said city for the lands purchased at the rate of $1.25 per acre: Provided, That the conveyance hereby authorized shall not include any lands which at the date of the issuance of patent shall be covered by a valid existing bona fide right or claim initiated under the laws of the United States: Provided further, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found in the lands so granted and all necessary use of the lands for extracting the same: And provided further, That said city shall not have the right to sell or convey the land herein granted, or any part thereof, or to devote the same to any other purpose than as hereinbefore described; and if the said land shall not be used for such municipal purpose, the same, or such parts thereof not so used, shall revert to the United States; the conditions and reservations herein provided for shall be expressed in the patent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bill, but I wish to offer an observation on it. I am a member of the Committee on Public Lands, but was not present when the bill came up, or I should have moved to amend it in one respect. It is properly safeguarded by the necessary stipulations in regard to reversion to the United States, so that the land could not be used for private speculation or anything of that kind; but, Mr. President, it seems to me that when the public lands of this country are granted to a municipality, a State, or any other public corporation of that nature we ought not to charge the municipality any money for them; we ought to give the lands to them. It is putting the land to a public use, and, to my mind, the city of Boulder ought not to be required to pay $1.25 an acre or any other sum to get the land.

I am not going to offer an amendment to that effect, but it seems to me that that should be our policy.

Mr. THOMAS. I sympathize with that view, but in view of the fact that the city is perfectly willing to pay for the land I can see no objection to requiring the payment.

Mr. NORRIS. I know. I have believed for some time that in the granting of rights for water power, for the development of electricity, and so forth, there ought to be no charge made where the public is getting the full benefit of the land or of the right, whatever it may be.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that $1.25 an acre would scarcely pay the expenses that the Government will be put to, or has already been put to, in order to get the land in such a condition that it can be transferred. It has always been the policy in the past, where public land has been transferred to a municipality, that a minimum charge of $1.25 an acre shall be made, and the Public Lands Committee has followed that practice in this case, just the same as in the past.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe there is a Member of Congress who is more desirous or more anxious than I am that the public lands and other property of the United States should be properly conserved; I think Senators who know my record while I have been in the Senate and in the House realize that I am often called a crank on the subject; but I believe in the kind of a policy I have suggested in order to let the people get the full benefit of the public property. I would be glad if the municipality, the State, or any other subdivision would utilize any land like this for a watershed or for a park or anything else wherever the people get the full benefit of it, and it does not seem to me that the Government of the United States ought to charge for it.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to say to the Senator from Nebraska that there is another very good reason for imposing a minimum charge. The minimum charge that is imposed in the bill is not onerous or burdensome to any community that has any need for the public lands, but with the minimum charge, when a community is compelled to pay something, it is the strongest kind of evidence that there is a real community need for the land. Without any charge Congress would be flooded with bills from every community where there are any public lands for lands of this character. With a minimum charge if is no hardship upon the community, and we are then limited in the consideration of such bills to where there is an actual need for the lands by the community.

Mr. NORRIS. What the Senator from Wisconsin says is true, and yet the principle remains the same. I am opposed to it on principle. We might have more bills for consideration, but as long as we have such property we ought to be willing to investigate every application, and if it is made in good faith I do not believe we ought to exact a charge for it. It takes the property where it ought to go—to the public—and the public is getting the full benefit of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the report submitted by me on the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report this day submitted by Mr. SMOOT is as follows:

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6410) authorizing the city of Boulder, Colo., to purchase certain public lands, having had the same under consideration, report favorably thereon without amendment with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The necessity of this legislation is fully set forth in House Report No. 254, this Congress, in the following language:

"This bill authorizes the city of Boulder, Boulder County, Colo., to purchase 400 acres of land in a compact body 1¼ miles in length by one-half mile in width, within the limits of the Colorado National Forest. The bill provides for the payment by the city of $1.25 per acre, exempts from its operation any lands covered by valid existing rights, or claims initiated in good faith under the laws of the United States, and contains the usual reservation of oil, coal, or other mineral deposits. By a committee amendment which will be offered to correct a clerical error (insertion of the word "not" after the word "shall" in line 14, page 2) the city must use the land only for the municipal purpose of water storage and supply of its waterworks, and the patent shall provide for the reversion of title to the Government upon failure to use the land for such municipal purpose."

This bill was submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, whose report follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 25, 1919.

Hon. N. J. SINNOTT,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SINNOTT: I am in receipt by your reference of June 23, 1919, for report on H. R. 6410, a bill "authorizing the city of Boulder, Colo., to purchase certain public lands," and in response thereto I have the honor to submit the following report:

The land embraced in the bill, aggregating 400 acres, was withdrawn by proclamation of March 2, 1907 (35 Stat., 2155), for the Medicine Bow National Forest.

The grant proposed by the bill to the city is for the "purposes of water storage and supply of its waterworks." The bill also refers to the act of March 2, 1907 (34 Stat., 1223), which authorized this city to purchase 1,524.26 acres for its water supply, and this bill appears to be an addition to the grant by said act.

It also appears from the records in the General Land Office that under the act of February 28, 1899 (30 Stat., 915), this city was donated 1,601.75 acres as a park and again under the act of August 22, 1912 (37 Stat., 325), the city purchased 1,200 acres for park purposes.

An obvious error occurs in line 14 on page 2 of the bill, which reads that said city shall have the right to sell or convey the land herein mentioned. The word "not" was evidently inadvertently omitted and should be inserted after the word "shall," said line 14.

Inasmuch as the land is within a national forest, I recommend that the bill be referred to the Secretary of Agriculture for a report. I find no objection to the bill when amended by the insertion of the word "not" above suggested if the Secretary of Agriculture has no objection to urge to the bill.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary.

Pursuant to the suggestion of Secretary Lane, the bill was referred to the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary, while making no objection to the bill, and approving its purpose, and reciting that similar legislation has been approved in a number of cases, suggests that a general law be enacted "under which the President, on request from the proper municipal authorities, would be authorized to withdraw from all forms of entry such national forest lands as in his judgment are essential to the adequate protection of a municipality's water supply," and transmits a draft of such a bill, which has been introduced by the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, under the number of H. R. 8580, and will be considered by the committee in the near future. The letter from the Acting Secretary is here recited in full for the information of the House, in deference to a desire recently expressed on the floor that this should be done in similar cases.

JULY 16, 1919.

Hon. N. J. SINNOTT,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SINNOTT: Receipt is acknowledged of your request for a report on the bill (H. R. 6410) "authorizing the city of Boulder, Colo., to purchase certain public lands."

The bill proposes that the city shall have the right to purchase, at a price of $1.25 per acre, 400 acres of land now within the boundaries of the Colorado National Forest, which are to be used for purposes of water storage and supply of the city's waterworks. A similar grant of 1,557 acres was made to the city by an act approved March 2, 1907 (34 Stat., 1223). The city is now changing its water-supply system, and as a result of the change ten 40-acre subdivisions, not included in the previous grant and not affecting the water supply under their old plans, will be crossed by the city's pipe line or fences or will to some extent contribute to the water-supply system.

At the present time there are approximately 1,300 cities and towns which obtain their water supply from national forests. In all of these cases the municipalities are interested, of course, in seeing that every reasonable protection possible be given to the water supply in order that there may be no injury to the health of the citizens. To meet this desire the department has worked out a form of cooperative agreement which provides for a restricted use of the watershed under such conditions as meet the approval of the municipal health officers. This arrangement works very satisfactorily and enables the municipalities to secure substantially what they desire, and at the same time enables the department to carry out the purposes for which the national forests were created. The only real flaw in this arrangement is that there is no law to prevent prospecting and mining operations on city watersheds, the mineral-land laws being applicable to such lands exactly as to all other lands in the national forests.

In recent years a number of acts for particular towns and cities have been passed, having to do in some form with a municipal water supply. In some cases grants were desired for small tracts on which the main waterworks were to be constructed. In others the cities sought extensive rights of way for such reservoirs and conduits as were needed. Examples of such right-of-way grants are those made to the cities of Los Angeles and San Francisco, Calif. A third class of laws authorizing cooperation are those which particularly have in view the protection of the watershed from which the water supply is secured. Examples of such laws are those for protecting the watersheds of the city of Colorado Springs and the town of Manitou, Colo. (act of Feb. 27, 1913; 37 Stat., 684), and Salt Lake City, Utah (act of Sept. 17, 1914; 38 Stat., 714). Each of these acts provide that the lands described therein shall be reserved from all forms of location or entry and set aside as a municipal water-supply reservation to be administered by this department in cooperation with the municipalities named, for the purpose of conserving the water supply and protecting it from pollution, as well as preserving the timber on the lands to accomplish more fully such purposes. In both cases the title to the land remains in the Government and the land continues a part of the national forest, but is dedicated to the particular purpose of water-supply protection.

These more recent acts indicate the progress of practical legislation and administration. Only the earlier acts passed title to the land from the Government to the municipality. In such cases, as is evidenced by the example of Boulder, the legislation is not adequate, since a change of plan of construction may at any time require the use or regulation of more or less land and the enactment of a remedial measure by Congress.

In view of the number of municipalities which obtain their water supply from the national forests, and the experience that the department has already had in entering into cooperative agreements looking to the protection of the watersheds, it is felt that the time is ripe for constructive watershed legislation which would make patch-work legislation of this kind unnecessary. It is therefore recommended that, instead of a special act in this case, to be inevitably followed by an increasing number of special bills to meet the individual requirements of each municipality, general legislation be enacted under which the President, on request from the proper municipal authorities, would be authorized to withdraw from all forms of entry such national forest lands as in his judgment are essential to the adequate protection of a municipality's water supply. Should legislation of such a character be enacted, there would be no difficulty in entering into cooperative agreements restricting the use of such areas in accordance with the views of the municipal authorities, while at the same time allowing the principal work of forestry to be carried on so far as proves to be consistent with the proper use of the land as a water-supply source. The expense of special sanitary patrol desired by municipalities should, it is felt, be borne by them, while the Forest Service would continue to do the work required by the protection and improvement of the forest. This could be controlled by the terms of the cooperative agreement in each case.

The inclosed draft of bill is, therefore, recommended to your committee as a substitute for the measure which you have submitted for report. If, however, your committee considers desirable the passage of H. R. 6410, your attention is invited to the fact that the two clauses of the proviso commencing at line 13, page 2, seem to be contradictory in terms, the word "not" apparently having been omitted from line 14, after the word "shall."

Very truly, yours,

CLARENCE OUSLEY,
Acting Secretary.

SPEECHES BY PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the speeches made by the President on September 8, 9, and 10. A similar request was granted for previous dates, and this brings them up to date.

Mr. LODGE. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The speeches referred to are as follows:

THE PRESIDENT AT DES MOINES, IOWA, SEPTEMBER 6, 1919.

"Mr. Chairman and fellow countrymen, you make my heart very warm with your generous welcome, and I want to express my unaffected gratitude to your chairman for having so truly struck the note of an occasion like this. He has used almost the very words that were in my thought, that the world is inflamed and profoundly disturbed, and we are met to discuss the measures by which its spirit can be quieted and its affairs turned to the right courses of human life. My fellow countrymen, the world is desperately in need of the settled conditions of peace, and it can not wait much longer. It is waiting upon us. That is the thought, that is the burdensome thought, upon my heart to-night, that the world is waiting for the verdict of the Nation to which it looked for leadership and which it thought would be the last that would ask the world to wait.

"My fellow citizens, the world is not at peace. I suppose that it is difficult for one who has not had some touch of the hot passion of the other side of the sea to realize how all the passions that have been slumbering for ages have been uncovered and released by the tragedy of this war. We speak of the tragedy of this war, but the tragedy that lay back of it was greater than the war itself, because back of it lay long ages in which the legitimate freedom of men was suppressed. Back of it lay long ages of recurrent war in which little groups of men, closeted in capitals, determined whether the sons of the land over which they ruled should go out upon the field and shed their blood. For what? For liberty? No; not for liberty, but for the aggrandizement of those who ruled them. And this had been slumbering in the hearts of men. They had felt the suppression of it. They had felt the mastery of those whom they had not chosen as their masters. They had felt the oppression of laws which did not admit them to the equal exercise of human rights. Now all of this is released and uncovered and men glare at one another and say, 'Now we are free and what shall we do with our freedom?'

"What happened in Russia was not a sudden and accidental thing. The people of Russia were maddened with the suppression of Czarism. When at last the chance came to throw off those chains, they threw them off, at first with hearts full of confidence and hope, and then they found out that they had been again deceived. There was no assembly chosen to frame a constitution for them, or, rather, there was an assembly chosen to choose a constitution for them and it was suppressed and dispersed, and a little group of men just as selfish, just as ruthless, just as pitiless, as the agents of the Czar himself, assumed control and exercised their power by terror and not by right. And in other parts of Europe the poison spread—the poison of disorder, the poison of revolt, the poison of chaos. And do you honestly think, my fellow citizens, that none of that poison has got in the veins of this free people? Do you not know that the world is all now one single whispering gallery? Those antennæ of the wireless telegraph are the symbols of our age. All the impulses of mankind are thrown out upon the air and reach to the ends of the earth; quietly upon steamships, silently under the cover of the Postal Service, with the tongue of the wireless and the tongue of the telegraph, all the suggestions of disorder are spread through the world. Money coming from nobody knows where is deposited by the millions in capitals like Stockholm, to be used for the propaganda of disorder and discontent and dissolution throughout the world, and men look you calmly in the face in America and say they are for that sort of revolution, when that sort of revolution means government by terror, government by force, not government by vote. It is the negation of everything that is American; but it is spreading, and so long as disorder continues, so long as the world is kept waiting for the answer to the question, What kind of peace are we going to have and what kind of guaranties are there to be behind that peace? that poison will steadily spread more and more rapidly, spread until it may be that even this beloved land of ours will be distracted and distorted by it.

"That is what is concerning me, my fellow countrymen. I know the splendid steadiness of the American people, but, my fellow citizens, the whole world needs that steadiness, and the American people are the makeweight in the fortunes of mankind. How long are we going to debate into which scale we will throw that magnificent equipoise that belongs to us? How long shall we be kept waiting for the answer whether the world may trust us or despise us? They have looked to us for leadership. They have looked to us for example. They have built their peace upon the basis of our suggestions. That great volume that contains the treaty of peace is drawn along the specifications laid down by the American Government, and now the world stands at amaze because an authority in America hesitates whether it will indorse an American document or not.

"You know what the necessity of peace is. Political liberty can exist only when there is peace. Social reform can take place only when there is peace. The settlement of every question that concerns our daily life waits for peace. I have been receiving delegations in Washington of men engaged in the service of the Government temporarily in the administration of the railways, and I have had to say to them, 'My friends, I can not tell what the railways can earn until commerce is restored to its normal courses. Until I can tell what the railroads can earn I can not tell what the wages that the railroads can pay will be. I can not suggest what the increase of freight and passenger rates will be to meet these increases in wages if the rates must be increased. I can not tell yet whether it will be necessary to increase the rates or not, and I must ask you to wait.' But they are not the only people that have come to see me. There are all sorts of adjustments necessary in this country. I have asked representatives of capital and labor to come to Washington next month and confer—confer about the fundamental thing of our life at present; that is to say, the conditions of labor. Do you realize, my fellow citizens, that all through the world the one central question of civilization is, 'What shall be the conditions of labor?' The profound unrest in Europe is due to the doubt prevailing as to what shall be the conditions of labor, and I need not tell you that that unrest is spreading to America.

"In the midst of the treaty of peace is a Magna Charta, a great guaranty for labor. It provides that labor shall have the counsels of the world devoted to the discussion of its conditions and of its betterment, and labor all over the world is waiting to know whether America is going to take part in those conferences or not. The confidence of the men who sat at Paris was such that they put it in the document that the first meeting of the labor conference under that part of the treaty should take place in Washington upon the invitation of the President of the United States. I am going to issue that invitation, whether we can attend the conference or not. But think of the mortification! Think of standing by in Washington itself and seeing the world take counsel upon the fundamental matter of civilization without us. The thing is inconceivable, but it is true. The world is waiting, waiting to see, not whether we will take part but whether we will serve and lead, for it has expected us to lead. I want to testify that the most touching and thrilling thing that has ever happened to me was what happened almost every day when I was in Paris. Delegations from all over the world came to me to solicit the friendship of America. They frankly told us that they were not sure they could trust anybody else, but that they did absolutely trust us to do them justice and to see that justice was done them. Why, some of them came from countries which I have, to my shame, to admit that I never heard of before, and I had to ask as privately as possible what language they spoke. Fortunately they always had an interpreter, but I always wanted to know at least what family of languages they were speaking. The touching thing was that from the ends of the earth, from little pocketed valleys, where I did not know that a separate people lived, there came men—men of dignity, men of intellectual parts, men entertaining in their thought and in their memories a great tradition, some of the oldest people of the world—and they came and sat at the feet of the youngest nation of the world and said, 'Teach us the way to liberty.'

"That is the attitude of the world, and reflect, my fellow countrymen, upon the reaction, the reaction of despair, that would come if America said, 'We do not want to lead you. You must do without our advice. You must shift without us.' Now, are we going to bring about a peace, for which everything waits? We can not bring it about by doing nothing. I have been very much amazed and very much amused, if I could be amused in such critical circumstances, to see that the statesmanship of some gentlemen consists in the very interesting proposition that we do nothing at all. I had heard of standing pat before, but I never had before heard of standpatism going to the length of saying it is none of our business and we do not care what happens to the rest of the world.

"Your chairman made a profoundly true remark just now. The isolation of the United States is at an end, not because we chose to go into the politics of the world but because by the sheer genius of this people and the growth of our power we have become a determining factor in the history of mankind, and after you have become a determining factor you can not remain isolated, whether you want to or not. Isolation ended by the processes of history, not by the processes of our independent choice, and the processes of history merely fulfilled the prediction of the men who founded our Republic. Go back and read some of the immortal sentences of the men that assisted to frame this Government and see how they set up a standard to which they intended that the nations of the world should rally. They said to the people of the world, 'Come to us; this is the home of liberty; this is the place where mankind can learn how to govern their own affairs and straighten out their own difficulties,' and the world did come to us.

"Look at your neighbor. Look at the statistics of the people of your State. Look at the statistics of the people of the United States. They have come, their hearts full of hope and confidence, from practically every nation in the world, to constitute a portion of our strength and of our hope and a contribution to our achievement. Sometimes I feel like taking off my hat to some of those immigrants. I was born an American. I could not help it, but they chose to be Americans. They were not born Americans. They saw this star in the west rising over the peoples of the world, and they said, 'That is the star of hope and the star of salvation. We will set our footsteps toward the west and join that great body of men whom God has blessed with the vision of liberty.' I honor those men. I say, 'You made a deliberate choice which showed that you saw what the drift and history of mankind was.' I am very grateful, I may say in parentheses, that I did not have to make that choice. I am grateful that ever since I can remember I have breathed this blessed air of freedom. I am grateful that every instinct in me, every drop of blood in me remembers and stands up and shouts at the traditions of the United States. But some gentlemen are not shouting now about that. They are saying, 'Yes; we made a great promise to mankind, but it will cost too much to redeem it.' My fellow citizens, that is not the spirit of America, and you can not have peace, you can not have even your legitimate part in the business of the world unless you are partners with the rest. If you are going to say to the world, 'We will stand off and see what we can get out of this,' the world will see to it that you do not get anything out of it. If it is your deliberate choice that instead of being friends you will be rivals and antagonists, then you will get exactly what rivals and antagonists always get, just as little as can be grudgingly vouchsafed you.

"Yet you must keep the world on its feet. Is there any business man here who would be willing to see the world go bankrupt and the business of the world stop? Is there any man here who does not know that America is the only nation left by the war in a position to see that the world does go on with its business? And is it your idea that if we lend our money, as we must, to men whom we have bitterly disappointed, that money will bring back to us the largess to which we are entitled? I do not like to argue this thing on this basis, but if you want to talk business, I am ready to talk business. If it is a matter of how much you are going to get from your money, I say you will not get half as much as antagonists as you will get as partners. Think that over, if you have none of that thing that is so lightly spoken of, known as altruism. And, believe me, my fellow countrymen, the only people in the world who are going to reap the harvest of the future are the people who can entertain ideals, who can follow ideals to the death.

"I was saying to another audience to-day that one of the most beautiful stories I know is the story that we heard in France about the first effect of the American soldiers when they got over there. The French did not believe at first, the British did not believe, that we could finally get 2,000,000 men over there. The most that they hoped at first was that a few American soldiers would restore their morale, for let me say that their morale was gone. The beautiful story to which I referred is this, the testimony that all of them rendered that they got their morale back the minute they saw the eyes of those boys. Here were not only soldiers. There was no curtain in front of the retina of those eyes. They were American eyes. They were eyes that had seen visions. They were eyes the possessors of which had brought with them a great ardor for a supreme cause, and the reason those boys never stopped was that their eyes were lifted to the horizon. They saw a city not built with hands. They saw a citadel toward which their steps were bent where dwelt the oracles of God himself. And on the battle field were found German orders to commanders here and there to see to it that the Americans did not get lodgment in particular places, because if they ever did you never could get them out. They had gone to Europe to go the whole way toward the realization of the teaching which their fathers had handed down to them. There never were crusaders that went to the Holy Land in the old ages that we read about that were more truly devoted to a holy cause than these gallant, incomparable sons of America.

"My fellow citizens, you have got to make up your minds, because, after all, it is you who are going to make up the minds of this country. I do not owe a report or the slightest responsibility to anybody but you. I do not mean only you in this hall, though I am free to admit that this is just as good a sample of America as you can find anywhere, and the sample looks mighty good to me. I mean you and the millions besides you, thoughtful, responsible American men and women all over this country. They are my bosses, and I am mighty glad to be their servant. I have come out upon this journey not to fight anybody but to report to you, and I am free to predict that if you credit the report there will be no fighting. It is not only necessary that we should make peace with Germany and make peace with Austria, and see that a reasonable peace is made with Turkey and Bulgaria—that is not only not all of it, but it is a very dangerous beginning if you do not add something to it. I said just now that the peace with Germany, and the same is true of the pending peace with Austria, was made upon American specifications, not unwillingly. Do not let me leave the impression on your mind that the representatives of America in Paris had to insist and force their principles upon the rest. That is not true. Those principles were accepted before we got over there, and the men I dealt with carried them out in absolute good faith; but they were our principles, and at the heart of them lay this, that there must be a free Poland, for example.

"I wonder if you realize what that means. We had to collect the pieces of Poland. For a long time one piece had belonged to Russia, and we can not get a clear title to that yet. Another part belonged to Austria. We got a title to that. Another part belonged to Germany, and we have settled the title to that. But we found Germany also in possession of other pieces of territory occupied predominately or exclusively by patriotic Poles, and we said to Germany, 'You will have to give that up, too; that belongs to Poland.' Not because it is ground, but because those people there are Poles and want to be parts of Poland, and it is not our business to force any sovereignty upon anybody who does not want to live under it. When we had determined the boundaries of Poland we set it up and recognized it as an independent Republic. There is a minister, a diplomatic representative, of the United States at Warsaw right now in virtue of our formal recognition of the Republic of Poland.

"But upon Poland center some of the dangers of the future. South of Poland is Bohemia, which we cut away from the Austrian combination. Below Bohemia is Hungary, which can no longer rely upon the assistant strength of Austria, and below her is an enlarged Roumania. Alongside of Roumania is the new Slavic Kingdom, that never could have won its own independence, which had chafed under the chains of Austria-Hungary, but never could throw them off. We have said, 'The fundamental wrongs of history center in these regions. These people have the right to govern their own Government and control their own fortunes.' That is at the heart of the treaty, but, my fellow citizens, this is at the heart of the future: The business men of Germany did not want the war that we have passed through. The bankers and the manufacturers and the merchants knew that it was unspeakable folly. Why? Because Germany by her industrial genius was beginning to dominate the world economically, and all she had to do was to wait for about two more generations when her credit, her merchandise, her enterprise, would have covered all the parts of the world that the great fighting nations did not control. The formula of pan-Germanism, you remember, was Bremen to Bagdad—Bremen on the North Sea to Bagdad in Persia. These countries that we have set up as the new home of liberty lie right along that road. If we leave them there without the guaranty that the combined force of the world will assure their independence and their territorial integrity, we have only to wait a short generation when our recent experience will be repeated. We did not let Germany dominate the world this time. Are we then? If Germany had known then that all the other fighting nations of the world would combine to prevent her action, she never would have dreamed of attempting it. If Germany had known—this is the common verdict of every man familiar with the politics of Europe—if Germany had known that England would go in, she never would have started it. If she had known that America would come in, she never would have dreamed of it. And now the only way to make it certain that there never will be another world war like that is that we should assist in guaranteeing the peace and its settlement.

"It is a very interesting circumstance, my fellow countrymen, that the league of nations will contain all the nations of the world, great and small, except Germany, and Germany is merely put on probation. We have practically said to Germany, 'If it turns out that you really have had a change of heart and have gotten nonsense out of your system; if it really does turn out that you have substituted a genuine self-governing Republic for a Kingdom where a few men on Wilhelmstrasse plotted the destiny of the world, then we will let you in as partners, because then you will be respectable.' In the meantime, accepting the treaty, Germany's Army is reduced to 100,000 men, and she has promised to give up all the war material over and above what is necessary for 100,000 men. For a nation of 60,000,000! She has surrendered to the world. She has said, 'Our fate is in your hands. We are ready to do what you tell us to do.' The rest of the world is combined, and the interesting circumstance is that the rest of the world, excluding us, will continue combined if we do not go into it. Some gentlemen seem to think they can break up this treaty and prevent this league by not going into it. Not at all.

"I can give you an interesting circumstance. There is the settlement, which you have heard so much discussed, about that rich and ancient Province of Shantung in China. I do not like that settlement any better than you do, but these were the circumstances: In order to induce Japan to cooperate in the war and clear the Pacific of the German power England, and subsequently France, bound themselves without any qualification to see to it that Japan got anything in China that Germany had, and that Japan would take it away from her, upon the strength of which promise Japan proceeded to take Kiaochow and occupy the portions of Shantung Province, which had been ceded by China for a term of years to Germany. The most that could be got out of it was that, in view of the fact that America had nothing to do with it, the Japanese were ready to promise that they would give up every item of sovereignty which Germany would otherwise have enjoyed in Shantung Province and return it without restriction to China, and that they would retain in the Province only the economic concessions such as other nations already had elsewhere in China—though you do not hear anything about that—concessions in the railway and the mines which had become attached to the railway for operative purposes. But suppose that you say that is not enough. Very well, then, stay out of the treaty, and how will that accomplish anything? England and France are bound and can not escape their obligation. Are you going to institute a war against Japan and France and England to get Shantung back for China? That is an enterprise which does not commend itself to the present generation.

"I am putting it in brutal terms, my fellow citizens, but that is the fact. By disagreeing to that provision, we accomplish nothing for China. On the contrary, we stay out of the only combination of the counsels of nations in which we can be of service to China. With China as a member of the league of nations, and Japan as a member of the league of nations, and America as a member of the league of nations, there confronts every one of them that now famous article 10, by which every member of the league agrees to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all the other member States. Do not let anybody persuade you that you can take that article out and have a peaceful world. That cuts at the root of the German war. That cuts at the root of the outrage against Belgium. That cuts at the root of the outrage against France. That pulls that vile, unwholesome Upas tree of Pan Germanism up by the roots, and it pulls all other 'pans' up, too. Every land-grabbing nation is served notice, 'Keep on your own territory. Mind your own business. That territory belongs to those people and they can do with it what they please, provided they do not invade other people's rights by the use they make of it.' My fellow citizens, the thing is going to be done whether we are in it or not. If we are in it, then we are going to be the determining factor in the development of civilization. If we are out of it, we ourselves are going to watch every other nation with suspicion, and we will be justified, too; and we are going to be watched with suspicion. Every movement of trade, every relationship of manufacture, every question of raw materials, every matter that affects the intercourse of the world, will be impeded by the consciousness that America wants to hold off and get something which she is not willing to share with the rest of mankind. I am painting the picture for you, because I know that it is as intolerable to you as it is to me. But do not go away with the impression, I beg you, that I think there is any doubt about the issue. The only thing that can be accomplished is delay. The ultimate outcome will be the triumphant acceptance of the treaty and the league.

"Let me pay the tribute which it is only just that I should pay to some of the men who have been, I believe, misunderstood in this business. It is only a handful of men, my fellow citizens, who are trying to defeat the treaty or to prevent the league. The great majority, in official bodies and out, are scrutinizing it, as it is perfectly legitimate that they should scrutinize it, to see if it is necessary that they should qualify it in any way, and my knowledge of their conscience, my knowledge of their public principle, makes me certain that they will sooner or later see that it is safest, since it is all expressed in the plainest English that the English dictionary affords, not to qualify it—to accept it as it is. I have been a student of the English language all my life and I do not see a single obscure sentence in the whole document. Some gentlemen either have not read it or do not understand the English language; but, fortunately, on the right-hand page it is printed in English and on the left-hand page it is printed in French. Now, if they do not understand English, I hope they will get a French dictionary and dig out the meaning on that side. The French is a very precise language, more precise than the English language, I am told. I am not on a speaking acquaintance with it, but I am told that it is the most precise language in Europe, and that any given phrase in French always means the same thing. That can not be said of English. In order to satisfy themselves, I hope these gentlemen will master the French version and then be reassured that there are no lurking monsters in that document; that there are no sinister purposes; that everything is said in the frankest way.

"For example, they have been very much worried at the phrase that nothing in the document shall be taken as impairing in any way the validity of such regional understandings as the Monroe doctrine. They say, 'Why put in "such regional understandings as"? What other understandings are there? Have you got something up your sleeve? Is there going to be a Monroe doctrine in Asia? Is there going to be a Monroe doctrine in China?' Why, my fellow citizens, the phrase was written in perfect innocence. The men that I was associated with said, 'It is not wise to put a specific thing that belongs only to one nation in a document like this. We do not know of any other regional understanding like it; we never heard of any other; we never expect to hear of any other, but there might some day be some other, and so we will say "such regional understandings as the Monroe doctrine,"' and their phrase was intended to give right of way to the Monroe doctrine in the Western Hemisphere. I reminded the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate the other day that the conference I held with them was not the first conference I had held about the league of nations. When I came back to this our own dear country in March last I held a conference at the White House with the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and they made various suggestions as to how the covenant should be altered in phraseology. I carried those suggestions back to Paris, and every one of them was accepted. I think that is a sufficient guaranty that no mischief was intended. The whole document is of the same plain, practical, explicit sort, and it secures peace, my fellow citizens, in the only way in which peace can be secured.

"I remember, if I may illustrate a very great thing with a very trivial thing, I had two acquaintances who were very much addicted to profanity. Their friends were distressed about it. It subordinated a rich vocabulary which they might otherwise have cultivated, and so we induced them to agree that they never would swear inside the corporate limits, that if they wanted to swear they would go out of town. The first time the passion of anger came upon them they rather sheepishly got in a street car and went out of town to swear, and by the time they got out of town they did not want to swear. That very homely illustration illustrates in my mind the value of discussion. Let me remind you that every fighting nation in the world is going to belong to this league, because we are going to belong to it, and they all make this solemn engagement with each other, that they will not resort to war in the case of any controversy until they have done one or other of two things, until they have either submitted the question at issue to arbitration, in which case they promise to abide by the verdict whatever it may be, or, if they do not want to submit it to arbitration, have submitted it to discussion by the council of the league.

"They agree to give the council six months to discuss the matter, to supply the council with all the pertinent facts regarding it, and that, after the opinion of the council is rendered, they will not then go to war if they are dissatisfied with the opinion until three more months have elapsed. They give nine months in which to spread the whole matter before the judgment of mankind, and if they violate this promise, if any one of them violates it, the covenant prescribes that that violation shall in itself constitute an act of war against the other members of the league. It does not provide that there shall be war. On the contrary, it provides for something very much more effective than war. It provides that that nation, that covenant-breaking nation, shall be absolutely cut off from intercourse of every kind with the other nations of the world; that no merchandise shall be shipped out of it or into it; that no postal messages shall go into it or come out of it; that no telegraphic messages shall cross its borders; and that the citizens of the other member States shall not be permitted to have any intercourse or transactions whatever with its citizens or its citizens with them. There is not a single nation in Europe that can stand that boycott for six months. There is not a single nation in Europe that is self-sufficing in its resources of food or anything else that can stand that for six months. And in those circumstances we are told that this covenant is a covenant of war. It is the most drastic covenant of peace that was ever conceived, and its processes are the processes of peace. The nation that does not abide by its covenants is sent to coventry, is taboo, is put out of the society of covenant-respecting nations.

"This is a covenant of compulsory arbitration or discussion, and just so soon as you discuss matters, my fellow citizens, peace looks in at the window. Did you ever really sit down and discuss matters with your neighbor when you had a difference and come away in the same temper that you went in? One of the difficulties in our labor situation is that there are some employers who will not meet their employees face to face and talk with them. I have never known an instance in which such a meeting and discussion took place that both sides did not come away in a softened temper and with an access of respect for the other side. The processes of frank discussion are the processes of peace not only, but the processes of settlement, and those are the processes which are set up for all the powerful nations of the world.

"I want to say that this is an unparalleled achievement of thoughtful civilization. To my dying day I shall esteem it the crowning privilege of my life to have been permitted to put my name to a document like that; and in my judgment, my fellow citizens, when passion is cooled and men take a sober, second thought, they are all going to feel that the supreme thing that America did was to help bring this about and then put her shoulder to the great chariot of justice and of peace which was going to lead men along in that slow and toilsome march, toilsome and full of the kind of agony that brings bloody sweat, but nevertheless going up a slow incline to those distant heights upon which will shine at last the serene light of justice, suffusing a whole world in blissful peace."

THE PRESIDENT AT AUDITORIUM, OMAHA, NEBR., SEPTEMBER 8, 1919.

"Mr. Chairman, my fellow citizens, I never feel more comfortable in facing my fellow citizens than when I can realize that I am not representing a peculiar cause, that I am not speaking for a single group of my fellow citizens, that I am not the representative of a party but the representative of the people of the United States. I went across the water with that happy consciousness, and in all the work that was done on the other side of the sea, where I was associated with distinguished Americans of both political parties, we all of us constantly kept at our heart the feeling that we were expressing the thoughts of America, that we were working for the things that America believed in. I have come here to testify that this treaty contains the things that America believes it.

"I brought a copy of the treaty along with me, for I fancy that, in view of the criticisms you have heard of it, you thought it consisted of only four or five clauses. Only four or five clauses out of this volume are picked out for criticism. Only four or five phrases in it are called to your attention by some of the distinguished orators who oppose its adoption. Why, my fellow citizens, this is one of the great charters of human liberty, and the man who picks flaws in it—or, rather, picks out the flaws that are in it, for there are flaws in it—forgets the magnitude of the thing, forgets the majesty of the thing, forgets that the counsels of more than 20 nations combined and were rendered unanimous in the adoption of this great instrument. Let me remind you of what everybody admits who has read the document. Everybody admits that it is a complete settlement of the matters which led to this war, and it conains the complete machinery which provides that they shall stay settled.

"You know that one of the greatest difficulties in our own domestic affairs is unsettled land titles. Suppose that somebody were mischievously to tamper with the land records of the State of Nebraska, and that there should be a doubt as to the line of every farm. You know what would happen in six months. All the farmers would be sitting on their fences with shotguns. Litigation would penetrate every community, hot feeling would be generated, contests not only of lawyers, but contests of force, would ensue. Very well, one of the interesting things that this treaty does is to settle the land titles of Europe, and to settle them in this way, on the principle that every land belongs to the people that live on it. This is actually the first time in human history that that principle was ever recognized in a similar document, and yet that is the fundamental American principle. The fundamental American principle is the right of the people that live in the country to say what shall be done with that country. We have gone so far in our assertions of popular right that we not only say that the people have a right to have a government that suits them, but that they have a right to change it in any respect at any time. Very well, that principle lies at the heart of this treaty.

"There are peoples in Europe who never before could say that the land they lived in was their own, and the choice that they were to make of their lives was their own choice. I know there are men in Nebraska who come from that country of tragical history, the now restored Republic of Poland, and I want to call your attention to the fact that Poland is here given her complete restitution; and not only is she given the land that formerly belonged to the Poles, but she is given the lands which are now occupied by Poles but had been permitted to remain under other sovereignties. She is given those lands on a principle that all our hearts approve of. Take what in Europe they call High Silesia, the mountainous, the upper, portions of the district of Silesia. The very great majority of the people in High Silesia are Poles, but the Germans contested the statement that most of them were Poles. We said, 'Very well, then, it is none of our business; we will let them decide. We will put sufficient armed forces into High Silesia to see that nobody tampers with the processes of the election, and then we will hold a referendum there, and those people can belong either to Germany or to Poland, as they prefer and not as we prefer.' And wherever there was a doubtful district we applied the same principle, that the people should decide and not the men sitting around the peace table at Paris. When these referenda are completed the land titles of Europe will be settled, and every country will belong to the people that live on it to do with what they please. You seldom hear of this aspect of this treaty, my fellow citizens.

"You have heard of the council that the newspaper men call the 'big four.' We had a very much bigger name for ourselves than that. We called ourselves the 'supreme council of the principal allied and associated powers,' but we had no official title, and sometimes there were five of us instead of four. Those five represented, with the exception of Germany, of course, the great fighting nations of the world. They could have done anything with this treaty that they chose to do, because they had the power to do it, and they chose to do what had never been chosen before, to renounce every right of sovereignty in that settlement to which the people concerned did not assent. That is the great settlement which is represented in this volume.

"And it contains, among other things, a great charter of liberty for the workingmen of the world. For the first time in history the counsels of mankind are to be drawn together and concerted for the purpose of defending the rights and improving the conditions of working people—men, women, and children—all over the world. Such a thing as that was never dreamed of before, and what you are asked to discuss in discussing the league of nations is the matter of seeing that this thing is not interfered with. There is no other way to do it than by a universal league of nations, and what is proposed is a universal league of nations. Only two nations are for the time being left out. One of them is Germany, because we did not think that Germany was ready to come in, because we felt that she ought to go through a period of probation. She says that she made a mistake. We now want her to prove it by not trying it again. She says that she has abolished all the old forms of government by which little secret councils of men sitting nobody knew exactly where determined the fortunes of that great nation and, incidentally, tried to determine the fortunes of mankind; but we want her to prove that her constitution is changed and that it is going to stay changed; and then who can, after those proofs are produced, say 'No' to a great people 60,000,000 strong, if they want to come in on equal terms with the rest of us and do justice in international affairs? I want to say that I did not find any of my colleagues in Paris disinclined to do justice to Germany. But I hear that this treaty is very hard on Germany. When an individual has committed a criminal act, the punishment is hard, but the punishment is not unjust. This nation permitted itself, through unscrupulous governors, to commit a criminal act against mankind, and it is to undergo the punishment, not more than it can endure, but up to the point where it can pay it must pay for the wrong that it has done.

"But the things prescribed in this treaty will not be fully carried out if any one of the great influences that brought that result about is withheld from its consummation. Every great fighting nation in the world is on the list of those who are to constitute the league of nations. I say every great nation, because America is going to be included among them, and the only choice, my fellow citizens, is whether we will go in now or come in later with Germany; whether we will go in as founders of this covenant of freedom or go in as those who are admitted after they have made a mistake and repented.

"I wish I could do what is impossible in a great company like this. I wish I could read that covenant to you, because I do not believe, if you have not read it yourself and have only listened to certain speeches that I have read, that you know anything that is in it. Why, my fellow citizens, the heart of that covenant is that there shall be no war. To listen to some of the speeches that you may have listened to or read, you would think that the heart of it was that it was an arrangement for war. On the contrary, this is the heart of that treaty: The bulk of it is concerned with arrangements under which all the members of the league—that means everybody but Germany and dismembered Turkey—agree that they never will go to war without first having done one or other of two things—either submitted the question at issue to arbitration, in which case they agree absolutely to abide by the verdict, or, if they do not care to submit it to arbitration, submitted it to discussion by the council of the league of nations, in which case they must give six months for the discussion and wait three months after the rendering of the decision, whether they like it or not, before they go to war. They agree to cool off for nine months before they yield to the heat of passion which might otherwise have hurried them into war.

"If they do not do that, it is not war that ensues; it is something that will interest them and engage them very much more than war; it is an absolute boycott of the nation that disregards the covenant. The boycott is automatic, and just as soon as it applies, then this happens: No goods can be shipped out of that country; no goods can be shipped into it. No telegraphic message may pass either way across its borders. No package of postal matter—no letter—can cross its borders either way. No citizen of any member of the league can have any transactions of any kind with any citizen of that nation. It is the most complete isolation and boycott ever conceived, and there is not a nation in Europe that can live for six months without importing goods out of other countries. After they have thought about the matter for six months, I predict that they will have no stomach for war.

"All that you are told about in this covenant, so far as I can learn, is that there is an article 10. I will repeat article 10 to you; I think I can repeat it verbatim, the heart of it at any rate. Every member of the league promises to respect and preserve as against external aggression—not as against internal revolution—the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every other member of the league, and if it is necessary to enforce this promise—I mean, for the nations to act in concert with arms in their hands to enforce it—then the council of the league shall advise what action is necessary. Some gentlemen who doubt the meaning of English words have thought that advice did not mean advice, but I do not know anything else that it does mean, and I have studied English most of my life and speak it with reasonable correctness. The point is this: The council can not give that advice without the vote of the United States, unless it is a party to the dispute; but, my fellow citizens, if you are a party to the dispute you are in the scrap anyhow. If you are a party, then the question is not whether you are going to war or not, but merely whether you are going to war against the rest of the world or with the rest of the world, and the object of war in that case will be to defend that central thing that I began by speaking about. That is the guaranty of the land titles of the world which have been established by this treaty. Poland, Czechoslavakia, Roumania, Jugoslavia—all those nations which never had a vision of independent liberty until now—have their liberty and independence guaranteed to them. If we do not guarantee them, then we have this interesting choice: I hear gentlemen say that we went into the recent war because we were forced into it, and their preference now is to wait to be forced in again. They do not pretend that we can keep out; they merely pretend that we ought to keep out until we are ashamed not to go in.

"This is the covenant of the league of nations that you hear objected to, the only possible guaranty against war. I would consider myself recreant to every mother and father, every wife and sweetheart in this country, if I consented to the ending of this war without a guaranty that there would be no other. You say, 'Is it an absolute guaranty?' No; there is no absolute guaranty against human passion; but even if it were only 10 per cent of a guaranty, would not you rather have 10 per cent guaranty against war than none? If it only creates a presumption that there will not be war, would you not rather have that presumption than live under the certainty that there will be war? For, I tell you, my fellow citizens, I can predict with absolute certainty that within another generation there will be another world war if the nations of the world do not concert the method by which to prevent it.

"But I did not come here this morning, I remind myself, so much to expound the treaty as to talk about these interesting things that we hear about that are called reservations. A reservation is an assent with a big but. We agree—but. Now, I want to call your attention to some of these buts. I will take them, so far as I can remember the order, in the order in which they deal with clauses of the league itself.

"In the first article of the covenant it is provided that a nation can withdraw from the league on two years' notice, provided at the time of its withdrawal, that is to say, at the expiration of the two years, it has fulfilled all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant. Some of our friends are very uneasy about that. They want to sit close to the door with their hands on the knob, and they want to say, 'We are in this thing but we are in it with infinite timidity; we are in it only because you overpersuaded us and wanted us to come in, and we are going to try this thing every now and then and see if it is locked, and just as soon as we see anything we don't like, we are going to scuttle.' Now, what is the trouble? What are they afraid of? I want you to put this to every man you know who makes this objection, what is he afraid of? Is he afraid that when the United States withdraws it will not have fulfilled its international obligations? Is he willing to bring that indictment against this beloved country? My fellow citizens, we never did fail to fulfill an international obligation and, God guiding and helping us, we never will. I for one am not going to admit in any connection the slightest doubt that, if we ever choose to withdraw, we will then have fulfilled our obligations. If I make reservations, as they are called, about this, what do I do? This covenant does not set up any tribunal to judge whether we have fulfilled our obligations at that time or not. There is only one thing to restrain us, and that is the opinion of mankind. Are these gentlemen such poor patriots that they are afraid that the United States will cut a poor figure in the opinion of mankind? And do they think that they can bring this great people to withdraw from that league if at that time their withdrawal would be condemned by the opinion of mankind? We have always been at pains to earn the respect of mankind, and we shall always be at pains to retain it. I for one am too proud as an American to say that any doubt will ever hang around our right to withdraw upon the condition of the fulfillment of our international obligations.

"I have already adverted to the difficulties under article 10 and will not return to it. That difficulty is merely, as I repeated it just now, that some gentlemen do not want to go in as partners, they want to go in as late joiners, because they all admit that in a war which imperils the just arrangements of mankind, America, the greatest, richest, freest people in the world must take sides. We could not live without taking sides. We devoted ourselves to justice and to liberty when we were born, and we are not going to get senile and forget it.

"They do not like the way in which the Monroe doctrine is mentioned. Well; I would not stop on a question of style. The Monroe doctrine is adopted. It is swallowed, hook, line, and sinker, and, being carefully digested into the central organism of the whole instrument, I do not care what language they use about it. The language is entirely satisfactory so far as I understand the English language. That puzzles me, my fellow citizens. The English language seems to have got some new meaning since I studied it that bothers these gentlemen. I do not know what dictionaries they resort to. I do not know what manuals of conscience they can possibly resort to. The Monroe doctrine is expressly authenticated in this document, for the first time in history, by all the great nations of the world, and it was put there at our request. When I came back to this dear country in March I brought the first draft, the provisional draft, of the covenant of the league. I submitted it to the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate of the United States, and I spent an evening discussing it with them. They made a number of suggestions. I carried every one of those suggestions to Paris, and every one of them was adopted. Now apparently they want me to go back to Paris and say, 'We are much obliged to you, but we do not like the language.' I suggested the other night that if they do not like that language there is another language in here. That page is English [illustrating]; this page is French [illustrating]—the same thing. If the English does not suit them, let them engage the interest of some French scholar and see if they like the French better. It is the same thing. It is done in perfect good faith. Nobody was trying to fool anybody else. This is the genuine work of honest men.

"The fourth matter that they are concerned about is domestic questions, so they want to put in a reservation enumerating certain questions as domestic questions which everybody on both sides of the water admits are domestic questions. That seems to me, to say the least, to be a work of supererogation. It does not seem to me necessary to specify what everybody admits, but they are so careful—I believe the word used to be 'meticulous'—that they want to put in what is clearly implied in the whole instrument. 'Well,' you say, 'why not?' Well, why not, my fellow citizens? The conference at Paris will still be sitting when the Senate of the United States has acted upon this treaty. Perhaps I ought not to say that so confidently. No man, even in the secrets of Providence, can tell how long it will take the United States Senate to do anything, but I imagine that in the normal course of human fatigue the Senate will have acted upon this treaty before the conference in Paris gets through with the Austrian treaty and the Bulgarian treaty and the Turkish treaty. They will still be there on the job. Now—every lawyer will follow me in this—if you take a contract and change the words, even though you do not change the sense, you have to get the other parties to accept those words. Is not that true? Therefore every reservation will have to be taken back to all the signatories of this treaty, and I want you to notice that that includes Germany. We will have to ask Germany's consent to read this treaty the way we understand it. I want to tell you that we did not ask Germany's consent with regard to the meaning of any one of those terms while we were in Paris. We told her what they meant and said, 'Sign here.' Are there any patriotic Americans who desire the method changed? Do they want me to ask the assembly at Weimar if I may read the treaty the way it means but in words which the United States Senate thinks it ought to have been written in? You see, reservations come down to this, that they want to change the language of the treaty without changing its meaning and involve all the embarrassments. Because, let me say, there are indications—I am judging not from official dispatches but from the newspapers—that people are not in as good a humor over in Paris now as they were when I was there, and it is going to be more difficult to get agreement from now on than it was then. After dealing with some of those gentlemen I found that they were as ingenious as any American in attaching unexpected meanings to plain words, and, having gone through the mill on the existing language, I do not want to go through it again on changed language.

"I must not turn away from this great subject without adverting to one particular in the treaty itself, and that is the provision with regard to the transfer of certain German rights in the Province of Shantung, China, to Japan. I have frankly said to my Japanese colleagues in the conference, and therefore I can without impropriety say it here, that I was very deeply dissatisfied with that part of the treaty. But, my fellow citizens, Japan agreed at that very time and as part of the understanding upon which those clauses were put into the treaty, that she would relinquish every item of sovereignty that Germany had enjoyed to China, and that she would retain only what other nations have elsewhere in China, certain economic concessions with regard to the railway and the mines, which she was to operate under a corporation and subject to the laws of China. As I say, I wish she could have done more. But suppose, as some have suggested, that we dissent from that clause in the treaty. You can not sign all of the treaty but one part, my fellow citizens. It is like the President's veto. He can not veto provisions in a bill. He has got either to sign the bill or veto the bill. We can not sign the treaty with the Shantung provision out of it, and if we could, what sort of service would we be doing to China?

"Let us state the facts with brutal frankness. England and France are bound by solemn treaty, entered into before the conference at Paris, before the end of the war, to give Japan what she gets in this treaty in the Province of Shantung. They can not in honor withdraw from that promise. They can not consent to a peace treaty which does not contain those provisions with regard to Shantung. England and France, therefore, will stand behind Japan, and if we are not signatories to the treaties and not parties she will get all that Germany had in Shantung, more than she will get under the promises which she made to us, and the only way we can get it away from her is by going to war with Japan and Great Britain and France. Does that look like a workable proposition? Is that doing China a service? Whereas, if we do accept this treaty, we are members of the league of nations, China is a member of the league, and Japan is a member of the league, and under that much-criticized article 10 Japan promises and we guarantee that the territorial integrity and political independence of China will be respected and preserved. That is the way to serve China. That is the only possible way in the circumstances to serve China.

"Therefore we can not rewrite this treaty. We must take it or leave it, and gentlemen, after all the rest of the world has signed it, will find it very difficult to make any other kind of treaty. As I took the liberty of saying the other night, it is a case of 'put up or shut up.' The world can not breathe in the atmosphere of negations. The world can not deal with nations who say, 'We won't play!' The world can not have anything to do with an arrangement in which every nation says, 'We will take care of ourselves.' Is it possible, my fellow citizens—is it possible, for the sinister thing has been suggested to me—that there is a group of individuals in this country who have conceived it as desirable that the United States should exercise its power alone, should arm for the purpose, should be ready for the enterprise, and should dominate the world by arms? There are indications that there are groups of citizens in this country who do not find that an unpalatable program. Are we going to substitute for Pan-Germanism a sinister Pan-Americanism? The thing is inconceivable. It is hideous. No man dare propose that in plain words to any American audience anywhere. The heart of this people is pure. The heart of this people if true. This great people loves liberty. It loves justice. It would rather have liberty and justice than wealth and power. It is the great idealistic force of history, and the idealism of America is what has made conquest of the spirits of men.

"While I was in Paris men of every race, from every quarter of the globe, sought interviews with us in order to tell us how absolutely they believed in America and how all their thoughts, all their pleas for help, all their hope of political salvation, reached out toward America, and my heart melted within me. I said to some of the simpler sort among them, 'I pray you that you will not expect the impossible. America can not do all the things that you are expecting her to do. The most that I can promise is that we will do everything we can.' And we are going to redeem that promise, not because I made it, but because when I made it I spoke the purpose and heart of the United States. If I felt that I personally in any way stood in the way of this settlement, I would be glad to die that it might be consummated, because I have a vision, my fellow citizens, that if this thing should by some mishap not be accomplished there would rest forever upon the fair name of this people a stain which could never be effaced, which would be intolerable to every lover of America, inconceivable to any man who knew the duty of America and was ready with stout heart to do it.

"I said just now at the opening that I was happy to forget on a campaign like this what party I belonged to, and I hope that you will not think that I am recalling what party I belong to if I say how proud I have been to stand alongside of Senator HITCHCOCK in this fight. I would be just as glad to stand by Senator NORRIS if he would let me. I refer to Senator HITCHCOCK because I know this is his home town and because of my personal regard for him, and because I wanted to make it the preface to say I want to be the brother and comrade and coworker of every man who will work for this great cause. It heartens me when I find, as I found in Des Moines and I find here, that there are more Republicans on the committees that meet me than Democrats. That may be in proportion to the population, but nevertheless I judge from what I see of these gentlemen that they are, at any rate, very favorable specimens and that I can take it for granted, because of what I see in my dealing with them, that they do represent some of the permanence and abiding influences of great communities like this. Why, the heart of America beats in these great prairies and on these hillsides. Sometimes in Washington you seem very far away. The voices that are most audible in Washington are not voices that anybody cares to listen to for very long, and it is refreshing to get out among the great body of one's fellow citizens and feel the touch of hand and the contact of shoulder and the impulse of mass movement which is going to make spiritual conquest of the world."

THE PRESIDENT AT COLISEUM, SIOUX FALLS, S. DAK., SEPTEMBER 8, 1919.

"Gov. Norbeck, my fellow citizens, I must admit that every time I face a great audience of my fellow countrymen on this trip I am filled with a feeling of peculiar solemnity, because I believe, my fellow countrymen, that we have come to one of the turning points in the history of the world, and what I as an American covet for this great country is that, as on other great occasions when mankind's fortunes hung in a nice poise and balance, America may have the distinction to lead the way.

"In order to enable you to realize some part of what is in my thought to-night, I am going to ask you to turn your thoughts back to the tragedy through which we have just passed. A little incident as we came along in the train to-day brought very close home to me the things that have been happening. A very quiet lady came up with a little crowd at a way station to shake hands with me, and she had no sooner taken my hand than she turned away and burst into tears. I asked a neighbor what was the matter, and he said she had meant to speak to me of her son who was dead in France, but that the words would not come from her lips. All over this country, my fellow citizens, there are women who have given up their sons, wives who have given up their husbands, young women who have given up their sweethearts, to die on the other side of the sea for a great cause which was not the peculiar cause of America but the cause of mankind and of civilization itself. I love to repeat what the people on the other side of the water said about those boys of ours. They told us that they did not look like any of the other soldiers, that they did not seem to be merely soldiers, that they seemed to be crusaders, that there was something in their eyes that they had never seen in the eyes of any other army, and I was reminded of what I had so often seen on former journeys across the seas: Going over in the steerage, bright-eyed men who had been permeated with the atmosphere of free America; coming back, among the immigrants coming from the old countries, dull-eyed men, tired-looking men, discouraged-looking men. They were all of them, going both ways, men who had come from across the sea, but going out they were going with the look of America in their eyes to visit the old people at home; coming back they had the fatigue of Europe in their eyes and had not yet got the feeling that penetrates every American, that there is a great future, that a man can handle his own fortunes, that it is his right to have his place in the world, and that no man that he does not choose is his master. And that is what these people saw in the eyes of the American boys who carried their arms across the sea. There was America in every one of those lively eyes, and America was not looking merely at the fields of France, was not merely seeking to defeat Germany; she was seeking to defeat everything that Germany's action represented, and to see to it that there never happened such a thing again.

"I want to remind you, my fellow countrymen, that that war was not an accident. That war did not just happen. There was not some sudden occasion which brought on a conflagration. On the contrary, Germany had been preparing for that war for generations. Germany had been preparing every resource, perfecting every skill, developing every invention, which would enable her to master the European world; and, after mastering the European world, to dominate the rest of the world. Everybody had been looking on. Everybody had known. For example, it was known in every war office in Europe, and in the War Department at Washington, that the Germans not only had a vast supply of great field guns but that they had ammunition enough for every one of those guns to exhaust the gun. Yet we were all living in a fool's paradise. We thought Germany meant what she said—that she was armed for defense; and that she never would use that great store of force against the rest of her fellow men. Why, my friends, it was foreordained the minute Germany conceived these purposes that she should do the thing which she did in 1914. That assassination of the Austrian Crown Prince in Serbia was not what started the war. They were ready to start it and merely made that an occasion and an excuse. Before they started it, Serbia had yielded to practically every demand they made of her, and they would not let the rest of the world know that Serbia had yielded, because they did not want to miss the occasion to start the war. They were afraid that other nations would prepare. They were afraid that they had given too much indication of what they were going to do and they did not want to wait. What immediately happened, when the other foreign offices of Europe learned of what was going on, was that from every other foreign office, so far as I have been able to learn, messages went to Berlin instructing their representatives to suggest to the German Government that the other Governments be informed and that an opportunity be obtained for a discussion, so as to see if war could not be avoided. And Germany did not dare discuss her purpose for 24 hours.

"I have brought back from Europe with me, my fellow citizens, a treaty in which Germany is disarmed and in which all the other nations of the world agree never to go to war without first of all having done one or other of two things, either having submitted the question in dispute to arbitration, in which case they will abide by the verdict, or, if they do not care to submit it to arbitration, having submitted it to discussion by the league of nations; that they will allow six months for the discussion; that they will publish all the facts to all the world; and that not until three months after the expiration of the six will they go to war. There is a period of nine months of cooling off, and Germany did not dare cool off for nine days! If Germany had dreamed that anything like the greater part of the world would combine against her, she never would have begun the war, and she did not dare to let the opinion of mankind crystallize against her by the discussion of the purposes which she had in mind. What I want to point out to you to-night is that we are making a fundamental choice. You have either got to have the old system, of which Germany was the perfect flower, or you have got to have a new system. You can not have a new system unless you provide a substitute, an adequate substitute, for the old, and when certain of our fellow citizens take the position that we do not want to go into any combination at all but want to take care of ourselves, all I have to say to them is that that is exactly the German position.

"Germany through the mouth of her Emperor—Germany through the mouths of her orators, Germany through the pens of her writers of all sorts—said, 'Here we stand, ready to take care of ourselves. We will not enter into any combination. We are armed for self-defense and no nation dares interfere with our rights.' That, it appears, is the American program in the eyes of some gentlemen; and I want to tell you that within the last two weeks the pro-German element in this country has lifted its head again. It is again heartened. It again has air in its lungs. It again says, 'Ah, now we see a chance when America and Germany will stand outside this league and take care of themselves.' Not take care of themselves as partners, I do not mean to intimate that, but where America will play the same rôle that Germany plays, under that old order which brought us through that agony of bloody sweat, that great agony in which the whole world seemed to be caught in the throes of a crisis, when for a long time we did not know whether civilization itself was going to survive or not. And do not believe, my fellow countrymen, that civilization is saved now. There were passions let loose upon the field of the world by that war which have not grown quiet yet, which will not grow quiet for a long time, and every element of disorder, every element of chaos, is hoping that there may be no steadying hand from a council of nations to hold the order of the world steady until we can make the final arrangements of justice and of peace. The treaty of peace with Germany is very much more than a treaty of peace with Germany. The German part of it takes a good many words, because there are a great many technical details to be arranged, but that is not the heart of the treaty. The heart of the treaty is that it undoes the injustice that Germany did; that it not only undoes the injustice that Germany did but it organizes the world to see that such injustice will in the future be impossible.

"And not forgetting, but remembering with intense sympathy the toiling mass of mankind, the conference at Paris wrote into the heart of that treaty a great charter of labor. I think that those of us who live in this happy land can have little conception of the conditions of labor in some of the European countries up to the period of the outbreak of this war, and one of the things that that treaty proposes to do is to organize the opinion of all nations to assist in the betterment and the release of the great forces of labor throughout the world. It is a laboring man's treaty in the sense that it is the average man's treaty. Why, my fellow citizens, the thing that happened at Paris was absolutely and literally unprecedented. There never was a gathering of the leading statesmen of the world before who did not sit down to divide the spoils, to make the arrangements the most advantageous that they could devise for their own strong and powerful Governments. Yet this gathering of statesmen sat themselves down to do something which a friend of mine the other day very aptly described as establishing the land titles of the world, because the principle underlying the treaty was that every land belonged to the native stock that lived in it, and that nobody had the right to dictate either the form of government or the control of territory to those people who were born and bred and had their lives and happiness to make there. The principle that nobody has the right to impose the sovereignty of any alien government on anybody was for the first time recognized in the counsels of international deliberation. In this league of nations covenant, which some men ask you to examine in a spot here and there with a magnifying glass, there lies at the heart of it this great principle, Nobody has the right to take any territory any more.

"You will see what our situation was: The Austrian Empire, for example, had gone to pieces, and here we were with the pieces on the table. The Austrian treaty is not yet completed, but it is being made on the same principle as the German, and will serve as an illustration. In the old days they would have compacted it between armies. They did not do that this time. They said, 'This piece belongs to the Poles and to nobody else. This piece belongs to the Bohemians and to nobody else. This piece belongs to Roumania, though she never could have got it for herself; we are going to turn it over to her, though other people want it. This piece belongs to the Slavs, who live in the northern Balkans—the Jugo-Slavs as we have come to know them to be—and they shall have what belongs to them.' When we turned to the property of Germany, which she had been habitually misgoverning—I mean the German colonies, particularly the colonies in Africa—there were many nations who would like to have had those rich, undeveloped portions of the world; but none of them got them. We adopted the principle of trusteeship. We said, 'We will put you in charge of this, that, and the other piece of territory, and you will make an annual report to us. We will deprive you of your trusteeship whenever you administer it in a way which is not approved by our judgment, and we will put upon you this primary limitation, that you shall do nothing that is to the detriment of the people who live in that territory. You shall not enforce labor on it, and you shall apply the same principles of humanity to the work of their women and children that you apply at home. You shall not allow the illicit trade in drugs and in liquors. You shall not allow men who want to make money out of powder and shot to sell arms and ammunition to those who can use them to their own disadvantage. You shall not make those people fight in your armies. The country is theirs, and you must remember that and treat it as theirs.' There is no more annexation. There is no more land grabbing. There is no more extension of sovereignty. It is an absolute reversal of history, an absolute revolution in the way in which international affairs are treated; and it is all in the covenant of the league of nations.

"The old system was, Be ready, and we can be ready. I have heard gentlemen say, 'America can take care of herself.' Yes, she can take care of herself. Every man would have to train to arms. We would have to have a great standing army. We would have to have accumulations of military material such as Germany used to have. We would enjoy the luxuries of taxes even higher than we pay now. We could accumulate our force, and then our force would have to be directed by some kind of sufficiently vigorous central power. You would have a military government in spirit if not in form. No use having a fighting nation if there is not somebody to swing it! If you do not want your President to be a representative of the civil purposes of this country, you can turn him into merely a commander in chief, ready to fight the world. But if you did nobody would recognize America in those strange and altered circumstances. All the world would stand at amaze and say, 'Has America forgotten everything that she ever professed?' The picture is one that every American repudiates; and I challenge any man who has that purpose at the back of his thought to avow it. If he comes and tells you that America must stand alone and take care of herself, ask him how it is going to be done, and he will not dare tell you, because you would show him the door and say, 'We do not know any such American.'

"Yet we can not do without force. You can not establish land titles, as I have expressed it, and not maintain them. Suppose that the land titles of South Dakota were disturbed. Suppose the farm lines were moved, say, 10 feet. You know what would happen. Along every fence line you would see farmers perching with guns on their knees. The only reason they are not perching now is that there are land deeds deposited in a particular place, and the whole majesty and force and judicial system of the State of South Dakota are behind the titles. Very well, we have got to do something like that internationally. You can not set up Poland, whom all the world through centuries has pitied and sympathized with, as the owner of her property and not have somebody take care that her title deeds are respected. You can not establish freedom, my fellow citizens, without force, and the only force you can substitute for an armed mankind is the concerted force of the combined action of mankind through the instrumentality of all the enlightened Governments of the world. This is the only conceivable system that you can substitute for the old order of things which brought the calamity of this war upon us and would assuredly bring the calamity of another war upon us. Your choice is between the league of nations and Germanism. I have told you what I mean by Germanism—taking care of yourselves, being armed and ready, having a chip on your shoulder, thinking of nothing but your own rights and never thinking of the rights of anybody else, thinking that you were put into this world to see that American might was asserted and forgetting that American might ought never to be used against the weak, ought never to be used in an unjust cause, ought never to be used for aggression; ought to be used with the heart of humanity beating behind it.

"Sometimes people call me an idealist. Well, that is the way I know I am an American. America, my fellow citizens—I do not say it in disparagement of any other great people—America is the only idealistic Nation in the world. When I speak practical judgments about business affairs, I can only guess whether I am speaking the voice of America or not, but when I speak the ideal purposes of history I know that I am speaking the voice of America, because I have saturated myself since I was a boy in the records of that spirit, and everywhere in them there is this authentic tone of the love of justice and the service of humanity. If by any mysterious influence of error America should not take the leading part in this new enterprise of concerted power, the world would experience one of those reversals of sentiment, one of those penetrating chills of reaction, which would lead to a universal cynicism, for if America goes back upon mankind, mankind has no other place to turn. It is the hope of nations all over the world that America will do this great thing. Yet I find some gentlemen so nervous about doing right that their eyes rest very uneasily on the first article of the covenant of the league of nations, and they say 'That says that we can get out after two years' notice, if we have fulfilled all our international obligations at that time. Now, we want to make it perfectly clear that we will get out when we want to.' You can not make it perfectly clear in the way they want it, unless you make it perfectly clear at the outset that you want to get out. You can not choose the seat by the door and keep fumbling with the knob without creating the impression that you are going to get out in a minute; that you do not like the company you are in; that you do not like the job; that you are by constitution and disposition a scuttler! If America goes into this thing, she is going to stay in, and she is going to stay in in order to see that justice is done. She can see to it, because if you read this covenant of the league you will find that, America being one of the members of the council of the league, nothing material can be done under that league without a unanimous vote of the council. America can determine what action is going to be taken. No action that is against her policy or against her will can be taken, unless her judgment is rendered in some case where she is one of the disputants, but, my fellow citizens, if she is one of the disputants, she is in trouble anyhow. If the war that they are trying to avert is her war, then I do not see that she is any more benefited by being out of the league than in it. On the contrary, if she is in the league, she has at least the good offices of other friendly States to see that some accommodation is reached.

"And she is doing exactly what she has done already. Some gentlemen forget that we already have nearly 30 treaties with the leading nations of the world. Yes; and to do the very thing that is in this covenant, only we agree to take 12 months to discuss everything, whereas the league gives 9 months. The American choice would be 12. We promise not to fight without first talking. I want to call a great many here witness to this circumstance, for I am sure by looking at you that you know something about it. What is the certain way to have difficulty between capital and labor? It is to refuse to sit down in the same room and talk it over. I can not understand why one man or set of men should refuse to discuss claims or grievances with another set of men, unless they know to begin with that they are wrong. I am very averse from discussing anything when I know I have got the wrong end, but when I think I have got either the right end or as good an end as the other fellow, then I am perfectly willing to discuss it. There is an old saying accredited to a rather cynical politician of what I hope I may regard as the older school, who said to his son, 'John, do not bother your head about lies; they will take care of themselves; but if you ever hear me denying anything, you may be sure it is so.' The only thing we are afraid of, the only thing we dodge, is the truth. If we see facts coming our way, it is just as well to get out of the way. Always take this attitude, my friends, toward facts: Always try to see them coming first, so that they will not catch you at unawares. So with all matters, grading up from the smallest to the greatest. Human beings can get together by discussion, and it is the business of civilization to get together by discussion and not by fighting. That is civilization. The only reason this country is civilized is because we do not let two men who have a difference fight one another. We say, 'Wait a minute; we have arranged for that. Just around the corner there you will find a courthouse. On certain days the court is sitting. Go and state the matter to those men, and neither before nor after the decision shall you touch one another.' That is civilization. You have got the ordered processes of consultation and discussion. You have got to act by rule, and justice consists in applying the same rule to everybody, not one rule to the rich man and another to the poor; not one rule to the employer and another to the employee, but the same rule to the strong and to the weak.

"That is exactly what is attempted in this treaty. I can not understand the psychology of men who are resisting it. I can not understand what they are afraid of, unless it is that they know physical force and do not understand moral force. Moral force is a great deal more powerful than physical. Govern the sentiments of mankind and you govern mankind. Govern their fears, govern their hopes, determine their fortunes, get them together in concerted masses, and the whole thing sways like a team. Once get them suspecting one another, once get them antagonizing one another, and society itself goes to pieces. We are trying to make a society instead of a set of barbarians out of the governments of the world. I sometimes think, when I wake in the night, of all the wakeful nights that anxious fathers and mothers and friends have spent during those weary years of this awful war, and I seem to hear the cry, the inarticulate cry of mothers all over the world, millions of them on the other side of the sea and thousands of them on this side of the sea, 'In God's name, give us the sensible and hopeful and peaceful processes of right and of justice!'

"America can stay out, but I want to call you to witness that the peace of the world can not be established without America. America is necessary to the peace of the world. And reverse the proposition: The peace and good will of the world are necessary to America. Disappoint the world, center its suspicion upon you, make it feel that you are hot and jealous rivals of the other nations, and do you think you are going to do as much business with them as you would otherwise do? I do not like to put the thing on that plane, my fellow countrymen, but if you want to talk business, I can talk business. If you want to put it on the low plane of how much money you can make, you can make more money out of friendly traders than out of hostile traders. You can make more money out of men who trust you than out of men who fear you. You can bring about a state of mind where by every device possible foreign markets will be closed to you, and men will say, 'No; the wheat of America tastes bitter; we will eat the wheat of Argentina; we will eat the wheat of Australia, for that is the wheat of friendship, and this is the wheat of antagonism. We do not want to wear clothes made out of American cotton; we are going to buy just as much cotton from India as we can. We are going to develop new cotton fields. America is up to something; we do not know just what, and we are going to shut and lock every door we can against her.' You can get the world in that temper. Do you think that would be profitable? Do you think there is money in that? But I am not going to dwell upon that side of it. I am just as sure of what you are thinking as I am of what I am thinking. We are not thinking of money. We would rather retain the reputation of America than have all the money in the world. I am not ready to die for money, and neither are you, but you are ready and I am ready to die for America.

"A friend of mine made a very poignant remark to me one day. He said, 'Did you ever see a family that hung its son's yardstick or ledger or spade up over the mantelpiece?' But how many of you have seen the lad's rifle, his musket, hung up! Well, why? A musket is a barbarous thing. The spade and the yardstick and the ledger are the symbols of peace and of steady business; why not hang them up? Because they do not represent self-sacrifice. They do not glorify you. They do not dignify you in the same sense that the musket does, because when you took that musket at the call of your country you risked everything and knew you could not get anything. The most that you could do was to come back alive, but after you came back alive there was a halo about you. That boy was in France! That boy served his country and served a great cause! That boy risked everything to see that the weak peoples of the world were redeemed from intolerable tyranny! Here comes—ah, how I wish I were going to be in Washington on the 17th—here comes, do you not hear it, the tread of the First Division; those men, along with their comrades, to whom the eyes of all Europe turn! All Europe took heart when they saw that brilliant flag unfurled on French soil.

"Did you ever hear that thrilling song that is being sung so much now of the blind Frenchman wishing to know if the Americans had come, bidding his son watch at the window. 'Look, my lad, what are they carrying? What are the colors? Are they red stripes upon a field of white? Is there a piece of heaven in the corner? Is that piece of heaven full of stars? Ah, the Americans have come! Thank God, the Americans have come!' That is what we have at our hearts, my fellow citizens, and we hang the musket up, or the sword, over the mantelpiece. And if the lad is gone and dead, we share the spirit of a noble lady, who said to me, without the glimmer of a tear in her eye, 'I have had the honor of losing a son upon the fields of France. I have had the honor, not the pain. I have had the distinction of losing a son of mine upon the field of honor.' It is that field of honor that we are going to redeem. We are not going to redeem it with blood any more, but we are going to make out of the counsels of the people of the world counsels of peace and of justice and of honor."

"Mr. Speaker, your excellency, gentlemen of the legislature, ladies and gentlemen, I esteem it an unusual privilege to stand in this place to-day and to address the members of this great body, because the errand upon which I have left Washington is so intimate a matter of the life of our own Nation as well as of the life of the world. Yet I am conscious, standing in this presence, that perhaps the most appropriate things I could allude to are those which affect us immediately. I know that you have been called together in special session for special objects. One of those objects you have achieved, and I rejoice with you in the adoption of the suffrage amendment. Another of the objects, I understand, is to consider the high cost of living, and the high cost of living is one of those things which are so complicated; it ramifies in so many directions that it seems to me we can not do anything in particular without knowing how the particulars affect the whole. It is dangerous to play with a complicated piece of machinery, piece by piece, unless you know how the pieces are related to each other.

"The cost of living at present is a world condition. It is due to the fact that the man power of the world has been sacrificed in the agony of the battle field and that all the processes of industry have been either slackened or diverted. The production of foodstuffs, the production of clothing, the production of all the necessaries of life has either been slackened or it has been turned into channels which are not immediately useful for the general civil population. Great factories, as I need not tell you, in our own country which were devoted to the uses of peace have recently been diverted in such fashion as to serve the purposes of war, and it will take a certain length of time to restore them to their old adjustments, to put their machinery to the old uses again, to redistribute labor so that it will not be concentrated upon the manufacture of munitions and the other stuffs necessary for war, but will be devoted to the general processes of production so necessary for our life.

"Back of all that—and I do not say this merely for an argumentative reason, but because it is true—back of that lies the fact that we have not yet learned what the basis of peace is going to be. The world is not going to settle down, my fellow citizens, until it knows what part the United States is going to play in the peace. And that for a very interesting reason. The strain put upon the finances of the other Governments of the world has been all but a breaking strain. I imagine that it will be several generations before foreign Governments can finally adjust themselves to carrying the overwhelming debts which have been accumulated in this war. The United States has accumulated a great debt, but not in proportion to those that other countries have accumulated when you reckon our wealth as compared with theirs. We are the only nation in the world that is likely in the immediate future to have a sufficient body of free capital to put the industrial world, here and elsewhere, on its feet again. Until the industrial world here and elsewhere is put on its feet you can not finally handle the question of the cost of living, because the cost of living in the last analysis depends upon the thing we are always talking about but do not know how to manage—the law of supply and demand. It depends upon manufacture and distribution. It depends upon all the normal processes of the industrial and commercial world. It depends upon international credit. It depends upon shipping. It depends upon the multiplication of transportation facilities domestically. Our railroads at this moment are not adequate to moving the commerce of this country. Every here and there they run through a little neck—for example, the Pennsylvania system at Pittsburgh—where everything is congested and you are squeezing a great commerce through a little aperture. Terminal facilities at the ports are not adequate. The problem grows the more you think of it. What we have to put our minds to is an international problem, first of all—to set the commerce of the world going again and the manufacture of the world going again. And we have got to do that largely. Then we have got to see that our own production and our own methods of finance and our own commerce are quickened in every way that is possible. And then we, sitting in legislatures like this and in the Congress of the United States, have to see to it, if you will permit a vulgar expression, that 'nobody monkeys with the process.'

"I understand that one of the excellent suggestions made by your governor is that you look into the matter of cold storage. Well, there are other kinds of storage besides cold storage. There are all sorts of ways of governing and concentrating the reserve stocks of goods. You do not have to keep everything cold, though you can keep the cold hand of control on it; you can manage by a concert that need not be put on paper to see to it that goods are doled out to the market so that they will not get there so fast as to bring the price down. The communities of the United States are entitled to see that these dams are removed and that the waters that are going to fructify the world flow in their normal courses. It is not easy. It is not always pleasant. You do not like to look censoriously into the affairs of your fellow citizens too much or too often, but it is necessary to look with a very unsympathetic eye at some of the processes which are retarding distribution and the supply which is going to meet the demand.

"Not only that, but we have got to realize that we are face to face with a great industrial problem which does not center in the United States. It centers elsewhere. But which we share with the other countries of the world. That is the relation between capital and labor, between those who employ and those who are employed, and we might as well sit up straight and look facts in the face, gentlemen. The laboring men of the world are not satisfied with their relations with their employers. Of course, I do not mean to say that there is universal dissatisfaction, because here, there, and elsewhere, in many cases fortunately, there are very satisfactory relations, but I am now speaking of the general relationship which exists between capital and labor. Everywhere there is dissatisfaction, with it much more acute on the other side of the water than on this side, and one of the things that have to be brought about for mankind can be brought about by what we do in this country, because, as a matter of fact, if I may refer for a moment to the treaty of peace, there is a part of that treaty which sets up an international method of consultation about the conditions of labor. It is a splendid instrument locked up in that great document. I have called it frequently the Magna Charta of labor, for it is that, and the standards set up, for standards are stated, are the standards of American labor so far as they could be adopted in a general conference. The point I wish to make is that the world is looking to America to set the standards with regard to the conditions of labor and the relations between labor and capital, and it is looking to us because we have been more progressive than other nations in those matters, though sometimes we have moved very slowly and with undue caution. As a result of our progressiveness the ruling influences among our working men are conservative in the sense that they see that it is not in the interest of labor to break up civilization, and progressive in the sense that they see that a constructive program has to be adopted. By a progressive I do not mean a man who is ready to move, but a man who knows where he is going when he moves. A man who has got a workable program is the only progressive, because if you have not got a workable program, you can not make it good and you can not progress. Very well, then, we have got to have a constructive program with regard to labor, and the minute we get it we will relieve the strain all over the world, because the world will accept our standards and follow our example. I am not dogmatic about this matter. I can not presume that I know how it ought to be done. I know the principle upon which it ought to be done. The principle is that the interests of capital and the interests of labor are not different but the same, and men of business sense ought to know how to work out an organization which will express that identity of interest. Where there is identity of interest there must be community of interest. You can not any longer regard labor as a commodity. You have got to regard it as a means of association, the association of physical skill and physical vigor with the enterprise which is managed by those who represent capital; and when you do, the production of the world is going to go forward by leaps and bounds.

"Why is it that labor organizations jealously limit the amount of work that their men can do? Because they are driving hard bargains with you; they do not feel that they are your partners at all, and so long as labor and capital are antagonistic production is going to be at its minimum. Just so soon as they are sympathetic and cooperative it is going to abound, and that will be one of the means of bringing down the cost of living. In other words, my fellow citizens, we can do something, we can do a great deal, along the lines of your governor's recommendation and along the lines that I took the liberty of recommending to the Congress of the United States, but we must remember that we are only beginning the push, that we are only learning the job, and that its ramifications extend into all the relationships of international credit and international industry. We ought to give our thought to this, gentlemen: America, though we do not like to admit it, has been very provincial in regard to the world's business. When we had to engage in banking transactions outside the United States we generally did it through English bankers or, more often, through German bankers. You did not find American banks in Shanghai and Calcutta and all around the circle of the world. You found every other bank there; you found French banks and English banks and German banks and Swedish banks. You did not find American banks. American bankers have not, as a rule, handled international exchange, and here all of a sudden, as if by the turn of a hand, because of the sweeping winds of this war which have destroyed so many things, we are called upon to handle the bulk of international exchange. We have got to learn it, and we have got to learn it fast. We have got to have American instrumentalities in every part of the world if American money is going to rehabilitate the world, as American money must.

"If you say, 'Why should we rehabilitate the world?' I will not suggest any altruistic motive; but if you want to trade you have got to have somebody to trade with. If you want to carry your business to the ends of the world, there must be business at the ends of the world to tie in with. And if the business of the world lags your industries lag and your prosperity lags. We have no choice but to be the servants of the world if we would be our own servants. I do not like to put it on that ground because that is not the American ground. America is ready to help the world, whether it benefits her or not. She did not come into the world. she was not created by the great men who set her Government up, in order to make money out of the rest of mankind. She was set up in order to rehabilitate the rest of mankind, and the dollar of American money spent to free those who have been enslaved is worth more than a million dollars put in any American pocket.

"It is in this impersonal way that I am trying to illustrate to you how the problem that we are facing in the high cost of living is the end and the beginning and a portion of a world problem, and the great difficulty just now, my fellow citizens, is in getting some minds adjusted to the world. One of the difficulties that are being encountered about the treaty and the league of nations, if I may be permitted to say so—and perhaps I can say so the more freely here because I do not think this difficulty exists in the mind of either Senator from this State—the difficulty is, not prejudice so much but that thing which is so common and so inconvenient—just downright ignorance. Ignorance, I mean, of the state of the world and of America's relation to the state of the world. We can not change that relation. It is a fact. It is a fact bigger than anybody of us, and one of the advantages that the United States has it ought not to forfeit; it is made up out of all the thinking peoples of the world. We do not draw our blood from any one source; we do not draw our principles from any one nation; we are made up out of all the sturdy stocks of the round world. We have gotten uneasy because some other kinds of stocks tried to come in; but the bulk remains the same; we are made up out of the hard-headed, hard-fisted, practical and yet idealistic, and forwarding-looking peoples of the world, and we of all people ought to have an international understanding, an ability to comprehend what the problem of the world is and what part we ought to play in that problem. We have got to play a part, and we can play it either as members of the board of directors or as outside speculators. We can play it inside or on the curb, and you know how inconvenient it is to play it on the curb.

"There is one thing that I respect more than any other, and that is a fact. I remember, when I was governor of the State of New Jersey, I was very urgently pressing some measures which a particular member of the senate of the State, whom I knew and liked very much, was opposed to. His constituents were very much in favor of it, and they sent an influential committee down personally to conduct his vote; and after he had voted for the measure they brought him, looking a little sheepish, into my office to be congratulated. Well, he and I kept as straight faces as we could, and I congratulated him very warmly, and then with a very heavy wink he said to me behind his hand, 'Governor, they never get me if I see 'em coming first.' Now, that is not a very high political principle, but I commend that principle to you with regard to facts. Never let them get you if you see them coming first; and any man with open eyes can see the facts coming, coming in serried ranks, coming in overwhelming power, not to be resisted by the United States or any other nation. The facts are marching and God is marching with them. You can not resist them. You must either welcome them or subsequently, with humiliation, surrender to them. It is welcome or surrender. It is acceptance of great world conditions and great world duties or scuttle now and come back afterwards.

"But I am not arguing this with you, because I do not believe it is necessary in the State of Minnesota. I am merely telling you. It is like the case of the man who met two of his fellow lawyers and asked them what they were discussing. They said, 'We were discussing who is the leading member of the bar of this county,' and the other said, 'Why, I am.' They said, 'How do you prove it?' He said, 'I don't have to prove it; I admit it.' I think that that is the state of mind of the thoughtful persons of our country, and they, thank God, are the chief portions of it, with regard to the great crisis that we are face to face with now.

"It has been a privilege, gentlemen, to be permitted in this informal way to disclose to you some part of the thought which I am carrying about with me as really a great burden, because I have seen the disturbed world on the other side of the water. I know the earnest hope and beautiful confidence with which they are looking toward us, and my heart is full of the burden of it. It is a great responsibility for us to carry. We will have to have infinite intelligence and infinite diligence in business to fulfill the expectations of the peoples of the world; and yet that is our duty, our inescapable duty, and we must concert together to perform it.

"Everywhere I have been on this trip the majority of the committee that has received me has consisted of Republicans, and nothing has pleased me so much, because I should be ashamed of myself if I permitted any partisan thought to enter into this great matter. If I were a scheming politician and anybody wished to present me with the peace of the world as a campaign issue, it would be very welcome, because there could be no issue easier to win on; but everybody knows that that is not a worthy thought, everybody knows that we are all Americans. Scratch a Democrat or a Republican and underneath it is the same stuff. And the labels rub off upon the slightest effort—not the memories, the recollections; some of them are very stubborn, but it is the principle that matters. The label does not make much difference. The principle is just the same, and the only thing we differ about is the way to carry out the principle. Back of all lies that wonderful thing, that thing which the foreigner was amazed to see in the faces of our soldiers, that incomparable American spirit which you do not see the like of anywhere; that universal brightness of expression, as if every man knew there was a future and that he had something to do with molding it, instead of that dull, expressionless face which means that there is nothing but a past and a burdensome present. You do not see that in the American face. The American face mirrors the future, and, my fellow citizens, the American purpose mirrors the future of the world."

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask that the hearings on the treaty of peace with Germany be printed as a Senate document, as only a small number were printed for the use of the committee. They are completely exhausted, and there is much demand for them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the hearings had on the treaty of peace with Germany be printed as a Senate document. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE KOREAN QUESTION.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I have had presented to me a comprehensive statement and brief in connection with the Korean situation, which, if there is no objection, I should like to have printed in the RECORD for the information of Senators and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the statement will be received and printed in the RECORD and so referred.

The statement is as follows:

KOREAN QUESTION BEFORE THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

[Statement and brief for the Republic of Korea, by Mr. Fred A. Dolph, counselor of the Republic of Korea.]

"THE CHARGES AGAINST JAPAN.

"Conforming to usual procedure, we first present for Korea the 'Charges against Japan,' although in this particular matter the facts embody obvious indictments in themselves.

"We preface these charges with this statement, which we now emphasize and which we wish all who are to pass upon these matters to keep continually in mind, that Korea for over 4,000 years, prior to any steps being taken by Japan to obtain sovereignty, was an independent nation, recognized and dealt with as such by all peoples and nations of the world. She had entered into treaties of amity and commerce with the principal powers—even Japan had made such a treaty in 1876—and had open diplomatic relations with all those powers, receiving diplomatic representatives into her country and being in turn represented in foreign countries by her diplomatic agents.

"Our own United States, in 1882, made such a treaty with Korea, not only recognizing Korea as an independent nation, but by the second paragraph of article 1 of that treaty specifically and mutually agreeing with Korea as follows:

"'If other powers deal unjustly or oppressively with either Government, the other will exert their good offices, on being informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement, thus showing their friendly feelings.'

"This was the status of Korea until 1894—undisputed, admitted, and recognized by all powers.

"Korea charges that Japan, during the period from 1894 to the present time, by successive acts of pretended friendship, cajolery, intimidation, and force of arms; using first one means and then another, and sometimes all, has obtained fraudulent possession of Korea and now claims complete sovereignty over the nation and is seeking to extinguish the lives and property rights of a race of 19,000,000 people to gratify her ambition to control first the Far East and then the world.

"Japan, in 1894, using as a means to an end the threat of Chinese encroachment upon Korea, obtained a treaty from Korea, permitting her military occupation of Korea during the period of her war with China. When that war was over, she did not remove all her troops as she had agreed to do by treaty, but instead began to bring pressure upon the King to secure all sorts of economic rights in Korea and to dominate the policies of the country.

"The Queen was vigorously protesting and using her influence to prevent this usurpation, and one night in October, 1895, at the direct instigation of the Japanese minister, Viscount Miura, Japanese entered the palace, searched until they found the terror-stricken Queen, murdered her, hacked her body into pieces, wrapped the pieces in a blanket, saturated the whole with oil, and burned the body. The grief-stricken King shortly after that, in February, 1896, made his successful escape to the Russian Embassy.

"This was a heavy blow to the Japanese. They saw that they had lost the person of the King, which to the oriental mind meant everything, and that methods must be devised to get the Emperor back within their power.

"Negotiations were opened up with the Russians, resulting in the agreement at Moscow and the subsequent protocol between Russia and Japan, made June 9, 1896, which recognized Korea as an independent nation and acknowledged her right to have her own armed force and police.

"Through the joint efforts of Russia and Japan, the King was induced to return to his palace and Japan agreeing to maintain only a consulate guard in Korea. Japan, for the time being, was louder and louder in her protestations of love and friendship for Korea and was ostentatiously instrumental in having the King proclaimed Emperor in order that he might be classed with the Emperor of Japan. The King was not impressed, but many of his subjects were.

"Then came the threat of Russian invasion. Due advantage of this was taken by Japanese propagandists, and in February, 1904, Korea was again induced to permit Japanese troops to occupy Korea for the purpose of repelling the Russian invasion, to remain during the war between Russia and Japan. The result of the Russian War was that in the treaty of Portsmouth, in 1905, Russia recognized 'the paramount rights of Japan in Korea.'

"Japan proceeded to exert her claimed 'paramount rights.' She remained in Korea with her troops in violation of her treaty agreements with Korea. She sought to profit by her experiences in trying to gain possession after the Chinese War, to use more positive and more aggressive means. In August, 1904, she forced Korea to consent to the appointment of official Japanese financial and diplomatic advisers, and to agree that no treaties should be made with foreign powers without her consent, and in April, 1905, she forced Korea to turn over to Japan all telephone and telegraph lines and other means of communication, and a few months later forced permission for Japanese vessels to navigate along the coast and in the inland waters of Korea.

"It was necessary, in furtherance of Japan's ambitions, that Dr. Allen, the American minister to Korea, a man of the highest American type, a true and fearless believer in fair play, should be removed. He had been in Korea during the previous attempt at usurpation after the Chinese War. He knew too much. His removal was accomplished through some means, and a Mr. Morgan was appointed to his place, a man wholly unfamiliar with previous happenings.

"All of these things decided the Emperor upon an appeal to the United States for protection under the treaty of 1882. He called in his personal friend and confidant, Prof. H. B. Hulbert, an American, and intrusted him with a letter for delivery to the President, containing a recital of Japanese oppression and a protest to our Government. Prof. Hulbert's first duty as a loyal American was to inform Mr. Morgan, the American minister, of his mission, which he did, and in October, 1905, left for America to carry out the Emperor's wish.

"By some means, whether fair or foul, the Japanese learned of the object of Prof. Hulbert's visit to the United States, and from that moment they brought to bear upon Korea all the force and aggressive methods their ingenuity could devise. Finally, in desperation, they resorted to brute force. They filled the palace with armed soldiers, and, assembling the Korean ministers, without call or legal notice, demanded of them and of the Emperor that they sign a treaty giving Japan a protectorate over Korea. They refused. The prime minister was taken into a side room and with drawn sword his life was threatened. He preferred to die rather than stultify himself or betray Korea. Awed before such evidence of courage and principle, the hand of the Japanese officer was stayed, and he returned to the audience chamber with great show of sheathing his sword, saying to the other ministers, 'Now, will you sign?' Through the night long this method of intimidation was continued until finally three of the weaker members of the ministry consented. The Emperor never did consent or sign, and to his dying day at every opportunity he protested the outrage. During the conference the Emperor managed to send word to have the great seal thrown into the lake, so that it could not be used, but the Japanese managed to secure the seal before this order could be carried out, and compelled the sealing of the alleged protectorate treaty of November 17, 1905.

"In the meantime Prof. Hulbert was speeding on his way to Washington. It was a race, with the future of Korea the stake. The so-called treaty of protectorate was forced on Korea almost simultaneously with his arrival in Washington, but although he immediately announced the arrival of the message, he was prevented either by circumstances or design from actually depositing the document until after Japan had announced that the treaty had been signed. Japan asserted that the treaty was entirely satisfactory to the Government and people of Korea. Her word was taken as true, and the appeal of the Emperor became simply a part of the files of the State Department. The next day Prof. Hulbert received a cable from the Emperor stating that the protectorate was invalid and that it had been obtained at the point of the sword. This was taken to the State Department by Prof. Hulbert, and it, too, became a part of the files.

"The Emperor, finding that some further appeal was necessary then set about presenting the matter to The Hague convention which was to sit in 1907. Upon Prof. Hulbert's return to Korea he was given formal commissions as envoy to the other powers, all identical in form, each reciting the fraudulent procurement of the alleged protectorate and asking for the good offices and intervention of the powers under their treaty stipulations.

"Japan was aware of these moves and successfully blocked the attempt on the part of Korea to secure a hearing at The Hague. Prof. Hulbert started on his second mission, but Japan, before he reached his destination, had forced the abdication of the Emperor in favor of his son. Prof. Hulbert's credentials being executed by the ex-Emperor, were considered nullified by his abdication, and the question of Korea's oppression was not considered by The Hague.

"The pitiful spectacle of the crowning of the new Emperor in August, 1907, amid the sullen silence of a resentful people has been repeatedly told by writers and historians. He had been non compos mentis from birth. The Japanese did all that was possible to prevent outside publicity. One writer says: 'In this they were well advised. No one who looked upon the new Emperor as he entered the hall of state, his shaking frame upborne by two officials, or as he stood later, with open mouth, fallen jaw, indifferent eyes, and face lacking even a flickering gleam of intelligent interest, could doubt that the fewer who saw this the better.'

"The first order procured by the Japanese from their puppet Emperor was an order disbanding the Korean Army. The superior officers were called to the residence of the Japanese commander, and the order read to them. They were told to assemble their men the next morning without arms and to dismiss them, and that in the meantime their arms would be secured in their absence. At least one officer committed suicide rather than execute the order. His men put up a sturdy resistance against all odds. From 8.30 in the morning until noon they fought desperately, until they were overpowered by sheer force of numbers. Thus the order was finally executed, and Korea was at Japan's mercy. All weapons were confiscated. Koreans were not allowed and are not now allowed to have arms or weapons of any kind. One butcher knife is permitted for the common use of five families, and when not in use it must be hung in a designated public place in plain view of Japanese police and gendarmes.

"With the crowning of the puppet Emperor Japan's control of Korea became absolute, but the watchful care of an idiot Emperor and the buying of toys and baubles became irksome to the aggressive Japanese, and in 1910 they came out openly and boldly with a proclamation of annexation.

"The old Emperor lived until January 24 of this year, always with the hope that he might do something to restore Korea to her place among nations and to gain freedom for his people. His last act was to gather up his few trinkets of jewelry to defray the expense of a delegation to the peace conference at Paris to present Korea's claims. The Japanese learned of this, and he suddenly died. Japan reported that he died of apoplexy. Other stories, fully as authentic and probable, are that he was murdered, that he committed suicide, and that he died of despair and a broken heart. The world may never know how he died, but when death did come he still had the love, sympathy, and trust of his people.

"This deprivation of the inherent right to self-government and our much talked of principle of self-determination is sufficient to make us pause and then act. If Japanese control had been humane and coupled with unselfish, sincere motives the principle of self-determination would even still hold true. But Japanese control has been distinctly bad, inhumane, and selfish. Koreans have been taxed to the limit. Their lands have been confiscated in favor of Japanese individuals and a Japanese controlled and chartered exploitation company. Japanese has been imposed upon the Koreans as the national language. Koreans are not given educational privileges. Their banks have been forced to consolidate with a Japanese controlled central bank. Unconscionable regulations are imposed upon Korean merchants and tradesmen. Their mines and forests have been confiscated. Police regulations are intolerable. There is said to be a policeman or gendarme for every five families. Koreans must tell where they want to go and why, and well-to-do Koreans must employ a Japanese butler, who regulates what they should buy and where. All news to the outside world is censored. Korean papers have been suppressed and ancient Korean historical records destroyed.

"The administration expense of such a government is enormous. This is defrayed wholly by a tax against Korea, with no representation whatever, of over 18 per cent of the gross income from all sources. License fees from infamous pursuit not before permitted in Korea, and revenues derived by Japan from the opium traffic, all of which she fosters and protects in Korea, are retained by Japan as her profits.

"It is not the purpose of this preliminary statement of the charges against Japan, however, to go into every detail of oppression and injustice. Those details, with evidentiary facts and proofs, will follow. It is sufficient if we here show violations of inherent rights. The details are but evidence of those violations.

"It is obvious that all of these acts of barbarity and oppression could not pass by without substantial resentment. There were many uprisings and much bloodshed, held in check more or less by the fact that the old Emperor was still alive. There were factions that feared injury to the old Emperor, whom they loved and respected with an adoration that is only possible with the oriental's inborn respect for ancestry and tradition. His death loosed all these ties, and, with a unanimity and organizing ability that has astonished the world, Koreans rose up with one voice for 19,000,000 people and proclaimed their restored independence on March 1, 1919, adopted their constitution along lines similar to ours, elected their officers, and announced to the world that there was the Republic of Korea.

"You already have before you the indisputable evidence of the ruthless manner in which Japan handled this uprising. It is all that can be expected of a militaristic government. Hundreds met horrible and brutal death, thousands were imprisoned, women were outraged, and all the brutalities and atrocities in Belgium were repeated again and again.

"These are Korea's 'Charges against Japan.' They are, necessarily, but an outline. All can not be told within the limits of one volume and by one man, and we must stop in order that we may within reasonable space give your committee the evidential proofs of these conditions.

"FACTS—DESCRIPTIVE DATA.

"The matters which we submit to the committee require a full statement of the political history of Korea and the political aspects of the Korean question.

"Data as to population, economic values, and resources are not technically involved in the principles for decision. At the same time this information is of interest because it bears upon the importance of the question, and as so little is known in the West about Korea of the Far East we digress for a brief reference to descriptive data.

"LOCATION, AREA, AND POPULATION.

"Korea is in about the same latitude and has about the same area and climate as New York and Pennsylvania combined, and is more densely populated by about one-half. To be exact, the latitude is north 33° to 42°, and the area is 84,173 square miles, including mainland, in the form of a peninsula about the shape of Florida and certain coast-lying islands. When the last census was taken in 1915 there were about 1.8 per cent Japanese. The total population was 16,278,389, divided between Japanese 303,659, Koreans 15,957,630, and foreigners 17,100. At the present time the Japanese population has probably increased to 3 per cent of the whole, and the population is now about 19,000,000.

"RESOURCES AND COMMERCE.

"The principal productions are from agriculture, mining, and fisheries. Very little manufacturing is done, and all resources and commerce are controlled by Japanese. They reported in 1917 that the total reached about 336,000,000 yen, or about $168,000,000. Of this amount about 75,000,000 yen, or $37,500,000, was exported. The imports were 57,000,000 yen, or $28,500,000.

"The Japanese percentage of foreign commerce, as they report, was about 73 per cent, the United States about 6 per cent. There is an unexplained discrepancy in the Japanese reports which would raise their percentage considerably. For instance, while they only report exports as 75,000,000 yen, yet in another part of their report they give the agricultural production as 300,000,000 yen, coupled with the statement that 70 per cent of that production was exported, which would be 210,000,000 yen, or 135,000,000 yen in excess of the entire total reported. Undoubtedly the Japanese percentage of exports and imports is nearer 95 per cent of the whole than the 73 per cent which they admit.

"AGRICULTURE.

"According to Japanese reports of 1917, about 80 per cent of the population was engaged in agricultural pursuits, and 15 per cent of the whole area of the country was under cultivation. This cultivated area would represent 8,080,640 acres, which they report produce 300,000,000 yen, or about $150,000,000, averaging $17.50 per acre.

"The principal products reported as to volume are, in the order named: Rice, wheat, barley, beans, millet, potatoes, sweet potatoes, cotton, cocoons, and cattle. Opium, ginseng, medicinal herbs, and the like are not reported.

"A Japanese exploitation company, chartered as the Oriental Development Co., seems to dominate the agricultural development and products of the country. It owns outright, according to its own reports, 73,382 cho—a cho being in the neighborhood of 2½ acres; this means 281 square miles, or 179,840 acres. It received, according to its statements, as rentals from this land a total of 1,688,000 yen, an average of $4.60 per acre.

"It will be noted that, while the Japanese were only 1.8 per cent of the whole population, this one exploitation company alone, Japanese controlled, owns 2.2 per cent of all of the tillable land. Data is not obtainable as to the amount of land owned by Japanese individuals, in addition to the holdings of this one Japanese corporation, but it is very evident that the Japanese are absorbing and confiscating all lands, and will eventually own all of the agricultural lands in Korea.

"An agricultural product that is not reported, for obvious reasons, is opium. Thousands of acres of poppy fields are cultivated under regulations which require the output to be delivered to the Japanese Government. How this branch of industry is fostered and encouraged by the Japanese is explained by William R. Giles in an article entitled, 'Korean poppies growing opium for Japanese,' published in the Buffalo Commercial July 1, 1919.

"MINING.

"The total mineral production as reported by the Japanese for 1916 was 20,830,000 yen—$10,415,000—consisting of gold and silver, $9,500,000; hard coal, $400,000; iron, $200,000; tungsten and copper, $150,000 each; and mica and miscellaneous ores, $15,000. The most successful gold-mining operations in Korea have been carried on by American corporations, but since the pretended annexation of Korea by Japan mining laws have been enacted and enforced prohibiting foreigners from securing any new concessions, and the status of the existing American concessions is at least precarious.

"Korea is very rich in natural mineral resources. The gold deposits are compared with those of Colorado; the anthracite coal fields to those of Pennsylvania; the iron deposits to those of Michigan; and the copper deposits to those of Montana. A recent news dispatch announcing the formation of a Japanese steel corporation, capitalized at $75,000,000, to get its iron ore from Korea seems to bear out these claims so far as iron ore and coal is concerned.

"FISHERIES.

"The Japanese report for 1916 gives the annual value of the fishery product at $7,975,000. Ten thousand six hundred Japanese boats earned $3,995,000, while it took, according to the Japanese reports, 34,000 Korean boats to earn an equal amount. This is evidently another instance of Japanese favoritism to Japanese and oppression of Koreans.

"RAILROADS.

"There are 1,066 miles of railroads in Korea earning a gross of about $4,000 per mile, divided 51 per cent freight and 49 per cent passenger. The total train-mileage operated in 1916 was 3,964,409 miles.

"The electric lines and tramways have a mileage of 84.4 and earned in 1916 572,465 yen with an operating expense of 301,726 yen, producing a net of 270,739 yen; about $135,000 on an investment of approximately $2,000,000.

"NAVIGATION.

"There are 19 lines of unsubsidized boats served with 5,491 vessels, not steamers, with a total tonnage of 55,000, and 154 steamers with a total tonnage of 40,000. There are 14 routes subsidized served by 1 ocean-going steamer, 22 coastwise boats, and 134 river boats.

"BANKS.

"The whole banking system is practically centralized into the Bank of Chosen, Japanese controlled, and a report from that bank in 1916 shows deposits of about $17,000,000; loans, about $15,000,000; discounts, about $13,000,000; and bank notes issued, $47,000,000. In addition to the above, the postal savings deposits were shown as around $5,000,000. The average deposit being about $5.

"POSTAL SERVICE.

"The postal service collected 89,000,000 pieces of ordinary mail and distributed 97,000,000; collected 1,300,000 parcels and delivered 1,500,000. The receipts were about $23,475,000 and the expenditures about $100,000 less.

"SCHOOLS.

"The 19,000,000 of Koreans are provided with but 526 schools with 87,000 pupils, or 1 pupil to every 220 of the population. This is less than five-tenths of 1 per cent. The 300,000 of Japanese are provided with 367 schools with 37,000 pupils, or 1 in every 8 of the population, a ratio of 12 per cent.

"CHURCHES.

"The Christians have 3,164 churches, the Buddhist 258, and the Shinto 65. There are 6,690 Christian ministers, 313 Buddhist priests, and 103 Shinto priests.

"FACTS—JAPANESE ADMINISTRATIVE GOVERNMENT.

"TAXES.

"Koreans have no vote, no representation, and no voice in the Government in any manner, shape, or form. The Japanese budget for administrative expenses for Korea for 1917 was 62,589,309 yen ($31,290,000). The resources of the country—that is, the earnings, so to speak—are reported at 336,000,000 yen ($168,000,000). The Korean therefore pays 18½ per cent of gross earnings and income to Japan for taxes, without any voice or representation.

"The largest item in this 1917 budget is for public undertakings, highways, harbors, etc., 20,802,634 yen ($10,400,000). This is used to improve public roads and harbors; obviously to improve Korea as a military base.

"The next highest item, and one out of all proportion with expenditures for like purposes in other countries, is 6,965,499 yen ($3,480,000) for courts and police. This is made necessary by the rigid and exacting police regulations. There is said to be a policeman or gendarme for every five families. The comings and goings of every Korean are registered. The most rigid censorship of news and communication is maintained. There is constant search for concealed weapons. Freedom of speech is denied and is prevented by the police. Household expenses are supervised. The most vigilant watch is kept over every act.

"In strong contrast to these two exorbitant items is the lowest item on the entire list, about $150,000 for the Korean schools. It is impossible to imagine the education Koreans must get at the rate of 7 cents per annum per capita.

"FORM OF GOVERNMENT.

"The Imperial edict of Japan, dated August 29, 1910, provides:

"We order the establishment of the office of governor general of Korea. The governor general will, under our direction, exercise the command of the army and navy, and a general control over all administrative functions of Korea.

"Imperial ordinance No. 354, dated October 20, 1910, follows this edict, detailing the government for Korea. Article 2 provides that the governor general shall be appointed from the Shin-nin rank, and shall be either a general or an admiral; article 3 that he shall be directly responsible to the Emperor; article 4 that he shall issue ordinances, the violation of which may be punished with penal servitude or imprisonment not exceeding one year, detention, or a fine of not exceeding 200 yen; and by article 5 he is given authority to abrogate all orders and regulations promulgated by those under him.

"Article 9 creates five departments—General affairs; home affairs; finance; agriculture, commerce, and industry; and the department of justice. By article 2 the governor general is given the following officials: Five departmental directors of the Choku-nin rank, nine bureau chiefs of the Choku-nin or So-nin rank, and the following officials of the So-nin rank: Two counselors, 19 secretaries, 19 assistant secretaries, 30 technical experts, 6 interpreters, and 367 officials of the Nan-nin rank. By article 20 two military attachés are provided for and one adjutant. The attachés to be major generals or rear admirals. The adjutant to be an officer below the rank of major general and rear admiral.

"COURTS.

"Imperial edict is that all judges and clerks of courts must be Japanese subjects, and in practical conduct of the courts only Japanese lawyers are recognized or permitted to practice.

"No bail is allowed in criminal cases. Habeas corpus is not known, and the fundamental rule that a man is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty is actually reversed. In Korea he is presumed to be guilty and must prove his innocence.

"The Korean arrested without notice, lodged in jail, given no opportunity to communicate with friends, represented—if he has any lawyer—by a Japanese who detests his client, before a Japanese judge, may be innocent, but his conviction is certain.

"On page 128 of Japan's report on 'Reforms and Progress in Korea,' for 1916–17 is found the statement that out of 82,121 offenders arrested 30 proved their innocence. It is beyond comprehension that only one man arrested out of every 2,500 was found to be innocent; yet this is what the Japanese say happened by their own record. Of course it is ridiculous and impossible. Thousands of Koreans, innocent of the charges made against them, are wrongfully convicted.

"It would make no difference with the result whether the accused was Korean or American. The percentages against him would be the same. The American would have the same 2,500 to 1 chance to lose that the Korean had. This is illustrated by the Mowry and Bell cases that were the subject of the resolution recently introduced by Senator HOKE SMITH.

"The Japanese reports show another practice that shocks the sense of justice, appalling and unbelievable. Yet there it is in black and white in Japan's own report, an exhibition of absolute lack of moral sense, referred to by them as a great thing they have accomplished—a great efficiency they have shown. They say they are able to convict a majority of the criminals arrested without a trial and that thereby they have saved the courts the expense of a trial. Great efficiency! The following are the actual figures reported:

"In 1913 there were 21,483 convictions without a trial out of 36,953.

"In 1914 there were 32,333 convictions without a trial out of 48,763.

"In 1915 there were 41,236 convictions without a trial out of 59,436.

"In 1916 there were 56,013 convictions without a trial out of 81,139.

"The acquittals in those years above tabulated, respectively, were 800, 93, 47, and 30. The total arrests increased each year, but the acquittals decreased in number each year. How come? These convictions involved not only sentences imposing fines but imprisonment at hard labor and flogging.

"No data is available as to civil procedure in the courts, but it is only fair to assume that the same measure of injustice was meted out.

"COMMERCE.

"As a matter of special interest to American exporters and importers, let us call attention to the fact that in the declaration of annexation communicated to the powers by Japan on August 29, 1910, that the existing schedule of customs duties expires with August 29, 1920, by article 2 of that declaration, and that by article 3 the 'open door' for vessels under the flags of other powers expires on the same date.

"MINING.

"We quote the following from the Japanese report of 1916, section 75, entitled 'Mining.'

"'As alluded to in the annual report for 1915, the mining ordinance was promulgated in December, 1915, to replace the old mining regulations. The main points of change are (1) the prohibition of foreigners from acquiring new mining permits in Chosen, except in the case of a corporation organized by foreigners as a Japanese legal being.' Those applications for mining permits filed with the authorities by foreigners according to the old regulations, and not granted by the time of the enforcement of the new regulations, have all been rejected.

"The minister of agriculture, commerce, and industry is the sole authority on all mining matters, subject only to the orders of the governor general, as shown by the following articles of the mining law:

"'ART. 7. The minister of agriculture, commerce, and industry shall have the power to refuse permission for mining, in case he considers such a step to be necessary in the public interest or for any other reason.

"'ART. 11. In case the holder of a mining right does not carry on operations properly or when his method of work is considered to involve danger or to be injurious to public interests, the minister of agriculture, commerce, and industry shall order the required improvement or precautionary measures or the suspension of operations.

"'ART. 12. The minister of agriculture, commerce, and industry may revoke the permission to carry on mining operations in the following cases:

"'A. When it is discovered that the permission was obtained by fraudulent means or granted by mistake.

"'B. When work has been stopped for one year or upward without adequate reason or when work has not been commenced within one year from the date when permission was obtained.

"'C. When the order mentioned in the second clause of article 9 or that mentioned in article 11 has not been obeyed.

"'D. When the mining operations are considered to be injurious to public interests.

"'E. When the land to be used for mining operations has been utilized for some other purpose.

"'F. When the royalty or ground tax has not been paid within the specified period.

"'G. When the holder of a mining right mentioned in the third clause of article 25 has not paid the contributions within the specified period.

"'H. When a fine has not been paid within the specified period.'

"Can we, by any stretch of imagination, conceive of a Korean obtaining a permit or of holding on to one he had obtained previously in the face of powers given a Japanese minister of the Choku-nin rank as above quoted, especially those italicized. By the same token are not American concessions already obtained and being operated upon with hundreds of thousands of dollars invested endangered by the provisions of article 12 and clauses 'D' and 'E' of article 12? Their rights are in the hands of this Japanese minister. He can easily find an excuse under those provisions to revoke the permit or to suspend operations.

"BANKS.

"On July 26, 1909, an order was made providing for the establishment of a central bank 'to perform such functions as pertain to the central financial medium in Korea and to deal in addition with the money of the Japanese treasury, if so requested by the Bank of Japan.' This central bank was to take over the redemption of the bank notes issued by a Japanese stock company, and the principal officers were to be appointed from among the Japanese. The Government of Korea was to guarantee a dividend of 6 per cent on the shares for a period of five years.

"This was before the alleged annexation, and after the annexation was asserted by Japan by law No. 48, promulgated March, 1911, the Bank of Chosen was chartered, and it became the bank for Korea. This bank was capitalized at 10,000,000 yen, of which Japan took 3,000,000 yen, and none but Japanese subjects were permitted to take the balance. The governor general of Korea appoints the directors and the governor of the bank is appointed by the Japanese Government. The bank may, with the sanction of the governor general, appoint agencies and correspondents and establish branch banks, and must appoint such as he designates on his own initiative, and the governor general has the power to suspend the bank at his discretion.

"The bank's report made in 1916 shows that it then had outstanding bank notes to the amount of $46,240.000, which was largely in excess of the deposits and the capital stock. Its condition was such that our comptroller, if the bank was within his jurisdiction, would be derelict in his duty if he did not close the doors. Yet it is in such a bank that the Korean must deposit his savings, and through which he must arrange his financial transactions.

"PERSONAL LIBERTY.

"We have already referred to the curtailment of personal liberty of the Koreans by the police and the courts while in Korea. Koreans outside of Korea can not return to their native land. Passports will not be issued without being visèed by Japanese consuls. Japanese consuls will not visé the passports unless the applicant will take an oath of allegiance to Japan. It is, of course, impossible for a loyal, conscientious Korean to take that oath.

"Koreans can not leave Korea for any purpose, even for educational purposes, except that permissions are given students to go to Japan. These permissions, however, are very rare, and the rule is not to permit the Korean to attend school above a certain prescribed elementary grade.

"'II. The Japanese representative, on his part, gives the assurance that the most complete and effective measures will be taken for the control of Japanese soshi.

"'III. The representative of Russia quite agrees with the representative of Japan that, at the present state of affairs in Korea, it may be necessary to have Japanese guards stationed at some place for the protection of the Japanese telegraph line between Fusan and Seoul, and that these guards, now consisting of three companies of soldiers, should be withdrawn as soon as possible and replaced by gendarmes, who will be distributed as follows: Fifty men at Tai-ku, 50 men at Kaheung, and 10 men each at 10 intermediate posts between Fusan and Seoul. This distribution may be liable to some changes, but the total number of the gendarme force shall never exceed 200 men, who will afterwards gradually be withdrawn from such places where peace and order have been restored by the Korean Government.

"'IV. For the protection of the Japanese settlements of Seoul and the open ports against possible attacks by the Korean populace, two companies of Japanese troops may be stationed at Seoul, one company at Fusan, and one at Gensan, each company not to exceed 200 men. These troops will be quartered near the settlements, and shall be withdrawn as soon as no apprehension of such attack could be entertained.

"'For the protection of the Russian Legation and consulate, the Russian Government may also keep guards not exceeding the number of Japanese troops at those places, and these will be withdrawn as soon as tranquillity in the interior is completely restored.

"JUNE 9, 1896—RUSSIA WITH JAPAN.

"'I. For the remedy of the financial difficulties of Korea, the Governments of Russia and Japan will advise the Korean Government to retrench all superfluous expenditure and to establish a balance between expenses and revenues. If, in consequence of reforms deemed indispensable, it may become necessary to have recourse to foreign loans, both Governments shall, by mutual concert, give their support to Korea.

"'II. The Governments of Russia and Japan shall endeavor to leave to Korea, as far as the financial and commercial situation of that country will permit, the formation and maintenance of a national armed force and police of such proportions as will be sufficient for the preservation of internal peace without foreign support.

"APRIL 25, 1898—RUSSIA WITH JAPAN.

"'ART. II. Desiring to avoid every possible cause of misunderstanding in the future, the Imperial Governments of Japan and Russia mutually engage in case Korea should apply to Japan or to Russia for advice and assistance not to take any measure in the nomination of military instructors and financial advisers without having previously come to a mutual agreement on the subject.

"'ART. III. In view of the large development of Japanese commercial and industrial enterprises in Korea, as well as the considerable number of Japanese subjects resident in that country, the Imperial Russian Government will not impede the development of the commercial and industrial relations between Japan and Korea.

"SEPTEMBER 11, 1899—KOREA WITH CHINA.

"'ARTICLE I. There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between the Empire of Korea and the Empire of China and between their respective subjects, who shall enjoy equally in the respective countries of the high contracting parties full protection and the advantages of favorable treatment.

"'If other powers should deal unjustly or oppressively with either Government, the other, on being informed of the case, will exert their good offices to bring about an amicable arrangement, thus showing their friendly feelings.

"'ART. II. After the conclusion of the treaty of amity and commerce the high contracting parties may each appoint diplomatic representatives to reside at the court of the other and may each appoint consular representatives at the ports of the other which are open to foreign commerce at their own convenience.

"JANUARY 30, 1902—JAPAN WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

"'ARTICLE I. The high contracting parties, having mutually recognized the independence of China and Korea, declare themselves to be entirely uninfluenced by any aggressive tendencies in either country. Having in view, however, their special interests, of which those of Great Britain relate principally to China, while Japan, in addition to the degree, politically as well as commercially and industrially, in Korea, the high contracting parties recognize that it will be admissible for either of them to take such measures as may be indispensable in order to safeguard those interests if threatened either by the aggressive action of any other power or by disturbance arising in China or Korea and necessitating the intervention of either of the high contracting parties for the protection of the lives and property of its subjects.

"FEBRUARY 23, 1904—KOREA WITH JAPAN.

"'ARTICLE I. For the purpose of maintaining a permanent and solid friendship between Japan and Korea and firmly establishing peace in the Far East, the Imperial Government of Korea shall place full confidence in the Imperial Government of Japan and adopt the advice of the latter in regard to improvements in administration.

"'ART. III. The Imperial Government of Japan definitely guarantee the independence and territorial integrity of the Korean Empire.

"'ART. IV. "'The Imperial Government of Japan may, for the attainment of the above-mentioned objects, occupy, when the circumstances require it, such places as may be necessary from strategical points of view.

"'ART. V. The Government of the two countries shall not in future, without mutual consent, conclude with a third power such an arrangement as may be contrary to the principles of the present protocol.

"'ART. III. The Korean Government shall previously consult the Japanese Government in concluding treaties and conventions with foreign powers, and in dealing with other important diplomatic affairs, such as the grant of concessions to or contracts with foreigners.

"APRIL 1, 1905—KOREA WITH JAPAN.

service exclusively pertaining to the department of the imperial household) to the Imperial Japanese Government.

"'ART. II. The land, buildings, furnitures, instruments, machines, and all other appliances connected with the system of communications already established by the Imperial Government of Korea, shall, by virtue of the present agreement, be transferred to the control of the Imperial Japanese Government.

"'ART. III. When it is deemed necessary by the Japanese Government to extend the communications system in Korea they may appropriate land and buildings belonging to the State or to private persons; the former without compensation and the latter with proper indemnification.

"'ART. V. All appliances and materials which are deemed necessary by the Imperial Government of Japan for the control or the extension of the system of communications shall be exempt from all duties and imposts.

"'ART. VII. In respect of the arrangement formerly entered into by the Korean Government with the Governments of foreign powers, concerning the post, telegraph, or telephone services, the Japanese Government shall, in behalf of Korea, exercise the rights and perform the obligations pertaining thereto. Should there arise in the future any necessity for concluding any new convention between the Government of Korea and the Governments of foreign powers concerning the communications services, the Japanese Government shall assume the responsibility of concluding such convention in behalf of the Korean Government.

"'ART. VIII. The various conventions and agreements respecting the communications service hitherto existing between the Governments of Japan and Korea are mutually abolished or modified by the present agreement.

"———, 1905—RUSSIA WITH JAPAN (PORTSMOUTH).

"'The Imperial Russian Government acknowledging that Japan possesses in Korea paramount political, military, and economical interests, engage neither to obstruct nor interfere with the measures of guidance, protection, and control which the Imperial Government of Japan may find it necessary to take in Korea.

"'It is understood that Russian subjects in Korea shall be treated exactly in the same manner as the subjects or citizens of other foreign powers; that is to say, they shall be placed on the same footing as the subjects or citizens of the favored nation.

"'It is also agreed that in order to avoid all cause of misunderstanding the two high contracting parties shall abstain, on the Russo-Korean frontier, from taking any military measure which may menace the security of Russian or Korean territory.

"AUGUST 15, 1905—KOREA WITH JAPAN.

"'ART. VIII. When a Japanese vessel or the crew thereof infringes the stipulations of the present agreement or of other treaties, or when a member of the crew commits any crime, the Japanese consular offices shall deal with the case in accordance with the provisions of the treaties and the laws of Japan.

"SEPTEMBER 27, 1905—JAPAN WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

"' (a) The consolidation and maintenance of the general peace in the regions of eastern Asia and of India;

"' (b) The preservation of the common interests of all powers in China by insuring the independence and integrity of the Chinese Empire and the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations in China;

"' (c) The maintenance of the territorial rights of the high contracting parties in the regions of eastern Asia and of India, and the defense of their special interests in the said regions.

"'ART. III. Japan possessing paramount political, military, and economic interests in Korea, Great Britain recognizes the right of Japan to take such measures of guidance, control, and protection in Korea as she may deem proper and necessary to safeguard and advance these interests, provided always that such measures are not contrary to the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations.

"OCTOBER, 1905—THE KOREAN EMPEROR PROTESTS JAPANESE OPPRESSION TO UNITED STATES.

"'The Emperor of Korea, being aware of the fact that in his treaty with America there was a clause in which the American Government promised to use its good offices if Korea was endangered and announced the fact to us, determined to appeal to our Government to carry out that important clause of the treaty. The following is a translation of his letter to the Washington Government;

"'Ever since 1883 the United States and Korea have been in friendly treaty relations. Korea has received many proofs of the good will and the sympathy of the American Government and people. The American representatives have always shown themselves to be in sympathy with the welfare and progress of Korea. Many teachers have been sent from America who have done much for the uplift of our people.

"'But we have not made the progress that we ought. This is due partly to the political machinations of foreign powers and partly to our mistakes. At the beginning of the Japan-Russia War the Japanese Government asked us to enter into an alliance with them, granting them the use of our territory, harbors, and other resources, to facilitate their naval and military operations. Japan, on her part, guaranteed to preserve the independence of Korea and the welfare and dignity of the royal house. We complied with Japan's request, loyally lived up to our obligations, and did everything that we had stipulated. By so doing we put ourselves in such a position that if Russia had won she could have seized Korea and annexed her to Russian territory on the ground that we were active allies of Japan.

"'It is now apparent that Japan proposes to abrogate their part of this treaty and declare a protectorate over our country in direct contravention of her sworn promise in the agreement of 1904. There are several reasons why this should not be done.

"'In the first place, Japan will stultify herself by such a direct breach of faith. It will injure her prestige as a power that proposes to work according to enlightened laws.

"'In the second place, the actions of Japan in Korea during the past two years give no promise that our people will be handled in an enlightened manner. No adequate means have been provided whereby redress could be secured for wrongs perpetrated upon our people. The finances of the country have been gravely mishandled by Japan. Nothing has been done toward advancing the cause of education or justice. Every move on Japan's part has been manifestly selfish.

"'The destruction of Korea's independence will work her a great injury, because it will intensify the contempt with which the Japanese people treat the Koreans and will make their acts all the more oppressive.

"'We acknowledge that many reforms are needed in Korea. We are glad to have the help of Japanese advisers, and we are prepared loyally to carry out their suggestions. We recognize the mistakes of the past. It is not for ourselves we plead, but for the Korean people.

"'At the beginning of the war our people gladly welcomed the Japanese, because this seemed to herald needed reforms and a general bettering of conditions, but soon it was seen that no genuine reforms were intended and the people had been deceived.

"'One of the gravest evils that will follow a protectorate by Japan is that the Korean people will lose all incentive to improvement. No hope will remain that they can ever regain their independence. They need the spur of national feeling to make them determine upon progress and to make them persevere in it. But the extinction of nationality will bring despair, and instead of working loyally and gladly in conjunction with Japan, the old-time hatred will be intensified and suspicion and animosity will result.

"'It has been said that sentiment should have no place in such affairs, but we believe, sir, that sentiment is the moving force in all human affairs, and that kindness, sympathy, and generosity are still working between nations as between individuals. We beg of you to bring to bear upon this question the same breadth of mind and the same calmness of judgment that have characterized your course hitherto, and, having weighed the matter, to render us what aid you can consistently in this our time of national danger.

"' (Private seal of the Emperor of Korea.)

"NOVEMBER 17, 1905—KOREA WITH JAPAN (PROTESTED AS FRAUDULENT).

"'ARTICLE 1. The Government of Japan, through the department of foreign affairs at Tokyo, will hereafter have control and direction of the external relations and affairs of Korea, and the diplomatic and consular representatives of Japan will have charge of the subjects and interests of Korea in foreign countries.

"'ART. 2. The Government of Japan undertake to see to the execution of the treaties actually existing between Korea and other powers, and the Government of Korea engage not to conclude hereafter any act or engagement having an international character, except through the medium of the Government of Japan.

"'ART. 3. The Government of Japan shall be represented at the court of His Majesty the Emperor of Korea by a resident general, who shall reside at Seoul, primarily for the purpose of taking charge of and directing matters relating to diplomatic affairs. He shall have the right of private and personal audience of His Majesty the Emperor of Korea. The Japanese Government shall also have the right to station residents at the several open ports and such other places in Korea as they may deem necessary. Such residents shall, under the direction of the resident general, exercise the powers and functions hitherto appertaining to Japanese consuls in Korea, and shall perform such duties as may be necessary in order to carry into full effect the provisions of this agreement.

"'ART. 4. The stipulation of all treaties and agreements existing between Japan and Korea not inconsistent with the provisions of this agreement shall continue in force.

"'ART. 5. The Government of Japan undertake to maintain the welfare and dignity of the Imperial House of Korea.

"NOVEMBER 22, 1905—JAPANESE DECLARATION OF FOREGOING TREATY.

"'The relations of propinquity have made it necessary for Japan to take and exercise, for reasons closely connected with her own safety and repose, a paramount interest and influence in the political and military affairs of Korea. The measures hitherto taken have been purely advisory, but the experience of recent years has demonstrated the insufficiency of measures of guidance alone. The unwise and improvident action of Korea, more especially in the domain of her international concerns, has in the past been the most fruitful source of complications. To permit the present unsatisfactory condition of things to continue unrestrained and unregulated would be to invite fresh difficulties, and Japan believes that she owes it to herself and to her desire for the general pacification of the extreme East to take the steps necessary to put an end once and for all to this dangerous situation. Accordingly, with that object in view and in order at the same time to safeguard their own position and to promote the well-being of the Government and people of Korea, the Imperial Government have resolved to assume a more intimate and direct influence and responsibility than heretofore in the external relations of the Peninsula. The Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Korea are in accord with the Imperial Government as to the absolute necessity of the measure, and the two Governments, in order to provide for the peaceful and amicable establishment of the new order of things, have concluded the accompanying compact. In bringing this agreement to the notice of the powers having treaties with Korea, the Imperial Government declare that in assuming charge of the foreign relations of Korea and undertaking the duty of watching over the execution of the existing treaties of that country, they will see that those treaties are maintained and respected, and they also engage not to prejudice in any way the legitimate commercial and industrial interests of those powers in Korea.'

"NOVEMBER 25, 1905—UNITED STATES RECEIVES KOREAN PROTEST.

"See receipt therefor from Secretary of State, which appears on page 3925 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 18, 1919.

"NOVEMBER 26, 1905—KOREAN EMPEROR CABLES PROTEST TO UNITED STATES.

"See page 3925 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 18, 1919, containing following copy of cablegram delivered to the State Department:

"I declare that the so-called treaty of protectorate recently concluded between Korea and Japan was extorted at the point of the sword and under duress, and therefore is null and void. I never consented to it and never will. Transmit to American Government.

"THE EMPEROR OF KOREA.

"JUNE 22, 1906—EMPEROR OF KOREA APPOINTS SPECIAL ENVOY TO POWERS TO PROTEST JAPANESE ACTION.

"'By virtue of the power vested in us as the Emperor of Korea, and in accordance with the right granted us in the treaties between Korea and the various friendly powers, we hereby constitute and appoint Homer B. Hulbert as our special envoy to the Governments of the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Belgium, and China; and we hereby delegate to him full authority to represent our interests and those of the Korean Empire at the seat of each of these Governments.

"'In consonance with this we have instructed him to deliver to each of these Governments a document relative to the present political situation in Korea and to take such steps as may lead to the peaceful settlement of the difficulties which have arisen between our Government and that of Japan.

"'We hereby give him special authority to secure the adjustment of the matter before the peace conference at The Hague.

"'In witness whereof we here affix the imperial seal.

"'Done in Seoul this 22d day of June, A. D. 1906, and of the dynasty the five hundred and fifteenth year.'

"JUNE 22, 1906—EMPEROR EXECUTES FORMAL APPEAL TO GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE, BELGIUM, ITALY, CHINA, GERMANY, AND AUSTRIA.

"All identical in form with following, directed to the King of England:

"'For many years the Government of Korea has been in friendly treaty relations with the Government of Great Britain, and has often received evidences of the good will of that power. In this time of our difficulty we feel sure that all people who desire to see justice done will sympathize with us. In order to show that great injustice has been done us we hereby declare that the so-called treaty of November 18, 1905, was fraudulent, because (1) the signatures of certain members of our cabinet were obtained by intimidation and under duress, (2) we never authorized the cabinet to sign the document, and (3) the meeting of the cabinet at which it was signed was illegal, having been convened neither at our call nor that of the prime minister, but by the Japanese themselves.

"'We denounce that document as invalid in law, and we declare that under no circumstances will we voluntarily consent to the ratification of any instrument which impairs the independence of the Korean Empire.

"'Furthermore, in view of the violent manner in which the so-called treaty of last November was carried through, we deem it necessary and proper to declare to you that if at any future time any power shall claim to have obtained our consent to such an agreement that claim will either be wholly false or will be based upon acts wrung from us by force of arms or under threats of personal violence.

"'In view of the fact that we are at the present time de jure an independent power and nation, we request you to reassert your right to establish a legation at Seoul, or at least to prepare for such establishment by helping us to bring the matter before The Hague tribunal, in order that our legal and just claim to independence may be legally established.

"'Any further information that may be desired will be given by our fully accredited envoy, at whose hand we are transmitting this document.'

"JULY 19, 1907—OLD EMPEROR ABDICATES.

"'Let heaven hear. For over 40 years we have followed the work of our illustrious ancestors. Many troubles have come to us, and events have gone opposite to what we desired. Perhaps we have not always selected the best men for the national posts. Disturbances have constantly grown more acute, and all efforts to remedy them have generally failed. Difficulties have become pressing, and never has the distress among our people, or the heavy work of governing them, been so harassing as now. We are in fear and trepidation, and we feel as though walking on ice covering deep water. Occupants of our throne have become weary of their duty before us, and have resorted to abdication. We hereby hand over to the Crown Prince the task of administering the great affairs of state, and order the bureau of ceremony of the imperial household to carry out the details thereof.'

"The following account is given by a writer of Current History of the coronation of the new Emperor, said to be a non compos mentis (see The Tragedy of Korea, pp. 163 and 164):

"'The new Emperor of Korea was crowned amid the sullen silence of a resentful people. Of popular enthusiasm there was none. A few flags were displayed in the streets by the order of the police. In olden times a coronation had been marked by great festivities, lasting many weeks. Now there was gloom, apathy, indifference. News was coming in hourly from the Provinces of uprisings and murders. The Il Chin Hoi—they called themselves reformers, but the nation has labeled them traitors—attempted to make a feast, but the people stayed away. "This is the day not for feasting but for the beginning of a year of mourning," men muttered one to the other.

"'The Japanese authorities who controlled the coronation ceremony did all they could to minimize it and to prevent independent outside publicity. In this they were well advised. No one who looked upon the new Emperor as he entered the hall of state, his shaking frame upborne by two officials, or as he stood later, with open mouth, fallen jaw, indifferent eyes, and face lacking even a flickering gleam of intelligent interest, could doubt that the fewer who saw this the better. Yet the ceremony, even when robbed of much of its ancient pomp and all its dignity, was unique and picturesque.

"JULY 24, 1907—KOREA WITH JAPAN (PROTESTED).

"'ARTICLE 1. The Government of Korea shall act under the guidance of the resident general in respect to reforms in administration.

"'ART. 2. The Government of Korea engage not to enact any laws, ordinances or regulations, or to take any important measures of administration without the previous assent of the resident general.

"'ART. 3. The judicial affairs in Korea shall be set apart from the affairs of ordinary administration.

"'ART. 4. The appointment and dismissal of all high officials in Korea shall be made upon the concurrence of the resident general.

"'ART. 5. The Government of Korea shall appoint as Korean officials the Japanese subjects recommended by the resident general.

"'ART. 6. The Government of Korea shall not engage any foreigner without the concurrence of the resident general.

"JULY 30, 1907—NEW EMPEROR DISBANDS KOREAN ARMY.

"We quote the following from The Tragedy of Korea, page 159:

"'A few days later a fresh rescript was issued in the name of the new Emperor, ordering the disbanding of the Korean Army. This was written in the most insulting language possible. "Our existing army, which is composed of mercenaries, is unfit for the purposes of national defense,' it declared. It was to make way "for the eventual formation of an efficient army." To add to the insult the Korean Premier Yi was ordered to write a request to the resident general begging him to employ the Japanese forces to prevent disturbances when the disbandment took place. It was though the Japanese, having their heel upon the neck of the enemy, slapped his face to show their contempt for him. On the morning of August 1 some of the superior officers of the Korean Army were called to the residence of the Japanese commander, Gen. Hasegawa, and the order was read to them. They were told they were to assemble their men next morning, without arms, and to dismiss them, after paying their gratuities, while at the same time their weapons would be secured in their absence.

"AUGUST 1, 1907—JAPANESE IMPERIAL ORDINANCE NO. 319.

"'This ordinance is practically the same in its provisions as Ordinance No. 354, dated October 30, 1910, which has already been referred to by us under the title of "Japanese Administrative Government," except that the governor general was a civil officer and not a military officer. It contained an article, however, permitting him to call upon the commander in chief of the Imperial Army stationed in Korea whenever he deemed is necessary.

"MAY 15, 1908—JAPAN WITH UNITED STATES.

"'ARTICLE 1. The Japanese Government shall cause to be enforced in Korea simultaneously with the operation of this convention, laws and regulations relative to inventions, designs, trade-marks, and copyrights similar to those which now exist in Japan.

"'These laws and regulations are to be applicable to American citizens in Korea equally as to Japanese and Korean subjects. In case the existing laws and regulations of Japan referred to in the preceding paragraph shall hereafter be modified, those laws and regulations enforced in Korea shall also be modified according to the principle of such new legislation.

"JULY 12, 1909—KOREA WITH JAPAN.

"'ARTICLE 1. Until the system of justice and prisons in Korea shall have been recognized as complete, the Government of Korea delegates to the Government of Japan the administration of justice and prisons.

"'ART. 4. The Korean local authorities and public functionaries shall, according to their respective functions, submit to the control and direction of Japanese competent authorities in Korea, and render assistance to those authorities in respect of the administration of justice and prisons.

"AUGUST 29, 1910—JAPAN WITH KOREA.

"'ARTICLE 1. His Majesty the Emperor of Korea makes complete and permanent cession to His Majesty the Emperor of Japan of all rights of sovereignty over the whole of Korea.

"'ART. 2. His Majesty the Emperor of Japan accepts the cession mentioned in the preceding article, and consents to the complete annexation of Korea to the Empire of Japan.

"'ART. 3. His Majesty the Emperor of Japan will accord to Their Majesties the Emperor and ex-Emperor and His Imperial Highness the Crown Prince of Korea and their consorts and heirs such titles, dignty, and honor as are appropriate to their respective ranks, and sufficient annual grants will be made for the maintenance of such titles, dignity, and honor.

"'ART. 4. His Majesty the Emperor of Japan will also accord appropriate honor and treatment to the members of the Imperial House of Korea and their heirs, other than those mentioned in the preceding article, and the funds necessary for the maintenance of such honor and treatment will be granted.

"AUGUST 29, 1910—JAPANESE IMPERIAL RESCRIPT ON ANNEXATION.

"'We, attaching the highest importance to the maintenance of permanent peace in the Orient and the consolidation of lasting security to the Empire, and finding in Korea constant and fruitful sources of complication, caused our Government to conclude in 1905 an agreement with the Korean Government by which Korea was placed under the protection of Japan in the hope that all disturbing elements might thereby be removed and peace assured forever.

"'For the four years and over which have since elapsed, our Government have exerted themselves with unwearied attention to promote reforms in the administration of Korea, and their efforts have, in a degree, been attended with success. But at the same time the existing régime of government in that country has shown itself hardly effective to preserve peace and stability, and in addition a spirit of suspicion and misgiving dominates the whole peninsula. In order to maintain public order and security and to advance the happiness and well-being of the people, it has become manifest that fundamental changes in the present system of government are inevitable.

"'We, in concert with His Majesty the Emperor of Korea, having in view this condition of affairs and being equally persuaded of the necessity of annexing the whole of Korea to the Empire of Japan in response to the actual requirements of the situation have now arrived at an arrangement for such permanent annexation.

"'His Majesty the Emperor of Korea and the members of his Imperial House will, notwithstanding the annexation, be accorded due and appropriate treatment. All Koreans, being under our direct sway, will enjoy growing prosperity and welfare, and with assured repose and security will come a marked expansion in industry and trade. We confidently believe that the new order of things now inaugurated will serve as a fresh guarantee of enduring peace in the Orient.

"'We order the establishment of the office of Governor General of Korea. The Governor General will, under our direction, exercise the command of the army and navy and a general control over all administrative functions in Korea. We call upon all of our officials and authorities to fulfill their respective duties in appreciation of our will and to conduct the various branches of administration in consonance with the requirements of the occasion, to the end that our subjects may long enjoy the blessings of peace and tranquillity.

"AUGUST 29, 1910—JAPANESE NOTICE TO POWERS OF ANNEXATION.

"'By virtue of that important act which shall take effect on its promulgation on the 29th August, the Imperial Government of Japan undertake the entire government and administration of Korea, and they hereby declare that matter relating to foreigners and foreign trade in Korea shall be conducted in accordance with the following rules:

"'(1) The treaties hitherto concluded by Korea with foreign powers ceasing to be operative, Japan's existing treaties will, so far as practicable, be applied to Korea.

"'(2) Independently of any conventional engagements formerly existing on the subject, the Imperial Government of Japan will, for a period of 10 years, levy upon goods imported into Korea from foreign countries or exported from Korea to foreign countries, and upon foreign vessels entering any of the open ports of Korea, the same import and export duties and the same tonnage dues as under the existing schedules.

"'The same import or export duties and tonnage dues as those to be levied upon the aforesaid goods and vessels will also, for a period of 10 years, be applied in respect of goods imported into Korea from Japan or exported from Korea to Japan and Japanese vessels entering any of the open ports of Korea.

"'(3) The Imperial Government of Japan will also permit, for a period of 10 years, vessels under the flags of powers having treaties with Japan to engage in the coasting trade between the open ports of Korea and between those ports and any open ports of Japan.

"APRIL 21, 1913—JAPAN WITH POWERS.

"'A protocol agreed to at the conference held between the director of the bureau of foreign affairs of the government general of Chosen and the consular representatives of treaty powers concerned relating to the abolition of the system of foreign settlements in Chosen.

"'ARTICLE 1. The foreign settlements in Chosen, namely, Chemulpo, Chinnampo, Kunsan, Mokpo, Masampo, and Songehin shall be incorporated with the respective newly organized communes of Chosen, to which they appropriately belong.

"'ART. 3. The common funds and property, if any, belonging to the municipal councils of the said foreign settlements shall be transferred to the local authorities concerned.'

"TREATIES VOID BY REASON OF FRAUD AND DURESS.

"We have just furnished the committee, chronologically, all of the treaties and conventions and the formal official acts necessary to an understanding of the political status of Korea. No attempt has been made up to this time to introduce the concurrent facts, except in so far as they are developed by the formal treaties, conventions, and official protests that are matters of public record.

"The old Emperor's protest to the United States, already quoted at page 36, gave notice of Japan's oppression and selfish motives as evidenced by her acts, and seeks assistance and the good offices of the United States to prevent the consummation of the Japanese threatened destruction of the independence of Korea. This protest was prepared and dispatched before the alleged protectorate had been asserted by Japan, although its delivery was prevented by wily, crafty, diplomatic Japanese intrigue until after Japan had asserted its alleged protectorate.

"The official record shows you that this protest was prepared in October; that the protectorate was asserted November 17, 1905; that Japan gave out notice on November 22, 1905, to the powers that this protectorate was entirely agreeable to the Korean Government and the Korean people, now known by the world to have been a false announcement, but then taken without proof to be true; that on November 25, 1905, the Emperor's protest, prepared and dispatched in October to the United States, was officially delivered to the State Department; and that on November 26, 1905, the cable from the old Emperor asserting that the protectorate was obtained at the point of the sword and was null and void and that he had not consented to it and never would was also filed with the State Department of the United States. That cable has already appeared at page 39 of this statement and brief.

"The official record already quoted also shows your committee that the old Emperor found that a further appeal was necessary. On June 22, 1906, he commissioned a special envoy (see p. 5602 of this statement and brief) to the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Belgium, and China, with full authority to represent the interests of the Korean Empire at the seat of each of those Governments, and instructed him to deliver to each of those Governments a document relative to the political situation in Korea, and to take such steps as might lead to the peaceful settlement of the difficulties which had arisen with Japan. He was also given special authority to secure an adjustment of the matter before the peace conference at The Hague.

"This document which the special envoy was instructed to present to the powers has already been shown in the official record at page — of this statement and brief. It recited the fraudulent character of the asserted protectorate by Japan, declared that it was invalid, and that under no circumstances would the Government of Korea voluntarily consent to the ratification of any instrument which would impair the independence of Korea, and that if any power claimed that the protectorate had been with the consent of Korea that such claim would be wholly false; and in view of the fact that Korea was a de jure independent power and nation the powers were requested to reassert their right to establish diplomatic relations with Korea, and were also requested to aid Korea in bringing the matter before The Hague Tribunal in order that Korea's legal and just claim might be legally established.

"This is the official record, and it might well be said that it is sufficient in and of itself, without reference to extraneous proof to establish that the asserted protectorate of November 17, 1905, was void. The old Emperor, the acknowledged and recognized ruler of the Korean nation, that has had a national independent existence for over 4,000 years—to be exact ever since 2333 B. C.—officially denounces the announcement of the asserted protectorate as false. His denouncement and his assertions should be taken as true.

"Japan herself up to this time had been loudest in asserting to the world that Korea was an independent nation.

"For the purposes of proper explanation of the questions here involved, to your committee, we have not deemed it necessary to go back in the political history of Korea of 1876.

"By solemn treaties and conventions Japan reiterated again and again the sovereign independence of Korea. In the treaty with Korea dated February 26, 1876, Japan says: 'Chosen (Korea) being an independent State, enjoys the same sovereign rights as Japan.' In her treaty with China dated April 18, 1885, Japan agreed to withdraw her troops then stationed in Korea and forced China to agree to the same stipulation; and forced China to a mutual agreement to invite Korea to instruct and drill a sufficient armed force, to the end that she might herself protect her national security and to invite Korea to engage the services of officers of a third power to instruct such armed force, both China and Japan binding themselves not to send any of their officers to Korea for the purpose of giving such instruction.

"By Japan's treaty with Korea dated July 14, 1894, Japan covenanted 'That the independence of Korea was declared, confirmed, and established, and in keeping with it the Chinese troops were to be driven out of the country.'

"By her treaty with China dated April 1, 1895, Japan forced China to recognize definitely the full and complete independence of Korea.

"By her treaty with Russia dated June 9, 1896, Japan forced Russia to consent to the formation and maintenance by Korea of the national armed force.

"In the treaty with Korea dated February 23, 1904, Japan solemnly covenants by article 3 of that treaty as follows: 'The Imperial Government of Japan definitively guarantee the independence and territorial integrity of the Korean Empire.' In the same year that a protectorate was asserted Japan recognized the independent national existence of Korea by making two treaties with Korea by which she and her subjects acquired economic rights in Korea. On April 1, 1905, she covenanted with Korea for the purpose of acquiring the post, telegraph, and telephone lines in Korea, and on August 13, 1905, only a brief period of three months before asserting the alleged protectorate, she entered into a treaty with Korea, thereby recognizing the national independent existence of Korea and recognizing the right and jurisdiction of Korea to control navigation within her territorial limits, to permit Japanese vessels to navigate along the coast and in inland waters of Korea for the purpose of trade.

"So it appears that within a few months of the asserted protectorate that Japan recognized the national independent existence of Korea and had proclaimed that national independent existence to the world by her solemn treaties and covenants, and in more than one instance had forced other powers to do the same.

"Under such circumstances, why should not the protestation and written assertion of the recognized ruler of Korea, that the asserted protectorate was invalid, be accepted?

"However, in a presentation of such a momentous question, we might be considered derelict if we did not also present the extraneous proof to show that the Japanese announcement of November 22, 1905, to the powers, of the asserted protectorate of November 17, 1905, was false; that by crafty and malicious diplomatic intrigue she prevented delivery of the Korean protest to the United States until after her announcement of November 22, 1905; that by the same crafty and fraudulent diplomatic methods of intrigue, and by force, she procured the abdication of the old Emperor on July 19, 1907, in order to annul the previously executed authority to the Korean envoy and the protestation to the powers, thus making it impossible for the powers or The Hague convention to officially receive the envoy and to officially consider the protest; that Japan fraudulently and by political and diplomatic intrigue procured the crowning of a new Emperor—an unfortunate known to be non compos mentis from birth—and procured the disbanding of the Korean army; and how Japan dominated and influenced this poor unfortunate new Emperor by alternate threats and promises of new uniforms and toys, until she finally openly asserted the annexation of Korea and announced the abdication of this puppet Emperor on August 29, 1910.

"If we were to consider what must have been the attitude and temper of the Korean Government and of the Korean people at the time that Japan asserted the protectorate of 1905, we realize how absurd and impossible it would be for the Korean Government and the Korean people to voluntarily consent to this protectorate.

"The Koreans could not but remember, and we can not but remember, that in 1894 Japan procured permission to occupy Korea with her troops during her war with China, under the expressed promise to withdraw the troops at the conclusion of the war, and how at the conclusion of the war with China, Japan violated her treaty in this respect and entered upon a camapign of threats to secure economic privileges and to dominate Korea.

"How could Koreans forget, or we forget, that awful night in October, 1895, when, by Japanese instigation, the Queen, who, with all the power and influence with which she was endowed, was seeking to protect her beloved people from Japanese aggression, was ruthlessly murdered in cold blood and her body burned, and how the grief-stricken Emperor was finally obliged to flee from his own palace and from Japanese domination and threats and to take refuge in the Russian Embassy, a fugitive in his own country and among his own people.

"How can Koreans forget or we forget how intensively the Japanese then brought into play all their abilities of diplomatic craft and intrigue, and finally succeeded in getting the Emperor (then holding the title of King) to return to his palace, upon joint assurances of both Russia and Japan, and how for the time being Japan protested a love and friendship for Korea—that Korea, to her sorrow, and the world, to its horror, has since learned to be insincere.

"Koreans must have had in mind and we must bear in mind how Korea in February, 1904, again gave permission to Japan to occupy Korea with troops during the war with Russia, and how, flushed with her success in the Russian War, Japan, throwing off the guise of friendship, again violated her treaty and refused to withdraw her troops, virtually imprisoning the Emperor and boldly set about to confiscate the economic resources of the country and to dominate its governmental policies.

"It was fresh in the Korean mind that Japan at the end of a great war had defeated Russia and that in lieu of indemnity she had forced Russia to acknowledge her 'paramount rights' in Korea.

"It is impossible to conceive that Korea should forget all of these things and that it should voluntarily and of its own free will consent to, much less welcome, a protectorate from a country by whom she had been so misused.

"As we go back over the situation as it must have been in November, 1905, it becomes clearer and clearer that the crafty Japanese announcement of November 22, 1905, that Korea had consented to and welcomed the asserted protectorate, was absurdly and ridiculously false, and we became more and more convinced of the truth and sincerity of the old Emperor's protestations that the protectorate had not been consented to and would never be consented to by the Korean Government and Korean people.

"It seems so needless to present outside evidence; the most that can be said is that it is cumulative. We hesitate to burden your committee with a volume of outside proof on this matter, and feel that we must swerve from our original purpose to present all of the evidence and content ourselves with only a few quotations from authors of concurrent history.

"You already have before you the statement of Prof. Hulbert, which appears on pages 3924 to 3926 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in issue of August 18, 1919, to which you can refer.

"We have already quoted from the Tragedy of Korea, a contemporaneous history of current events by Mr. F. A. MacKenzie, on pages 41 and 42 of this statement and brief, covering the crowning of the new Emperor and the disbanding of the Korean Army. Mr. MacKenzie is a writer of note and a man of unimpeachable integrity, thoroughly familiar with the Korean question. The first edition of his work is said to be exhausted and a second edition is in process of publication, but the work can be obtained from any library.

"Prof. Hulbert, to whom we have had occasion to refer so many times in this statement and brief, is also the author of a work on Korean history entitled 'The Passing of Korea.' His thorough and intimate knowledge of the subject can not be questioned.

"There are many other authors and historians of note who have written of and treated the Korean question. The limited space to which we must confine ourselves prevents reference to or quotations from such writers. Permit us, however, to quote the following from pages 131 to 137 of Mr. MacKenzie's work, 'The Tragedy of Korea,' as showing what actually transpired in Korea during that month of November, 1905:

"'Early in November the Marquis Ito arrived in Seoul as special envoy from the Emperor of Japan, and he brought with him a letter from the Mikado saying that he hoped the Korean Emperor would follow the directions of the marquis and come to an agreement with him, as it was essential for the maintenance of peace in the Far East that he should do so. On November 15 Marquis Ito was received in formal audience and there presented a series of demands drawn up in treaty form. These were, in the main, that the foreign relations of Korea should now be placed entirely in the hands of Japan, the Korean diplomatic service be brought to an end, and the ministers recalled from foreign courts. The Japanese minister to Korea was to become supreme administrator to the country under the Emperor and the Japanese consuls in the different districts were to be made residents, with the powers of supreme local governors. In other words, Korea was entirely to surrender her independence as a State and was to hand over control of her internal administration to the Japanese. The Emperor met the request with a blank refusal. The conversation between the two, as reported at the time, was as follows:

"'The Emperor said:

"'"Although I have seen in the newspapers various rumors that Japan proposed to assume a protectorate over Korea, I did not believe them, as I placed faith in Japan's adherence to the promise to maintain the independence of Korea which was made by the Emperor of Japan at the beginning of the war and embodied in a treaty between Korea and Japan. When I heard you were coming to my country I was glad, as I believed your mission was to increase the friendship between our countries, and your demands have therefore taken me entirely by surprise."

"'To which Marquis Ito rejoined:

"'"These demands are not my own; I am only acting in accordance with a mandate from my Government, and if Your Majesty will agree to the demands which I have presented, it will be to the benefit of both nations, and peace in the East will be assured forever. Please, therefore, consent quickly."

"'The Emperor replied:

"'"From time immemorial it has been the custom of the rulers of Korea, when confronted with questions so momentous as this, to come to no decision until all the ministers, high and low, who hold or have held office, have been consulted and the opinion of the scholars and the common people have been obtained, so that I can not now settle this matter myself."

"'Said Marquis Ito again:

"'"Protests from the people can easily be disposed of, and for the sake of the friendship between the two countries Your Majesty should come to a decision at once."

"'To this the Emperor replied:

"'"Assent to your proposals would mean the ruin of my country, and I will therefore sooner die than agree to them."

"'The conference lasted nearly five hours, and then the marquis had to leave, having accomplished nothing. He at once tackled the members of the cabinet, individually and collectively. They were all summoned to the Japanese legation on the following day, and a furious debate began, starting at 3 o'clock in the afternoon and lasting till late at night. The ministers had sworn to one another beforehand that they would not yield. In spite of threats, cajoleries, and proffered bribes, they remained steadfast. The arguments used by Marquis Ito and Mr. Hayashi, apart from personal ones, were twofold. The first was that it was essential for the peace of the Far East that Japan and Korea should be united. The second appealed to racial ambition. The Japanese painted to the Koreans a picture of a great united East, with the Mongol nations all standing firm and as one against the white man, who would reduce them to submission if he could. The Japanese were determined to give the cabinet no time to regather its strength. On the 17th of November another conference began at 2 in the afternoon at the legation, but equally without result. Mr. Hayashi then advised the ministers to go to the palace and open a cabinet meeting in the presence of the Emperor. This was done, the Japanese joining in.

"'All this time the Japanese Army had been making a great display of military force around the palace. All the Japanese troops in the district had been for days parading the streets and open places fronting the imperial residence. The field guns were out and the men were fully armed. They marched, countermarched, stormed, made feint attacks, occupied the gates, put their guns in position, and did everything short of actual violence that they could to demonstrate to the Koreans that they were able to enforce their demands. To the cabinet ministers themselves and to the Emperor all this display had a sinister and terrible meaning. They could not forget the night in 1895 when the Japanese soldiers had paraded around another palace and when their picked bullies had forced their way inside and murdered the queen. Japan had done this before; why should she not do it again? Not one of those now resisting the will of Dai Nippon but saw the sword in front of his eyes and heard in imagination a hundred times during the day the rattle of the Japanese bullets.

"'That evening Japanese soldiers, with fixed bayonets, entered the courtyard of the palace and stood near the apartment of the Emperor. Marquis Ito now arrived, accompanied by Gen. Hasegawa, commander of the Japanese army in Korea, and a fresh attack was started on the cabinet ministers. The marquis demanded an audience of the Emperor. The Emperor refused to grant it, saying that his throat was very bad and he was in great pain. The marquis then made his way into the Emperor's presence and personally requested an audience. The Emperor still refused. "Please go away and discuss the matter with the cabinet ministers," he said.

"'Thereupon Marquis Ito went outside to the ministers. "Your Emperor has commanded you to confer with me and settle this matter," he declared. A fresh conference was opened. The presence of the soldiers, the gleaming of the bayonets outside, the harsh words of command that could be heard through the windows of the palace buildings were not without their effect. The ministers had fought for days, and they had fought alone. No single foreign representative had offered them help or counsel. They saw submission or destruction before them. "What is the use of our resisting?" said one. "The Japanese always get their way in the end." Signs of yielding began to appear. The acting prime minister, Han Kew Sul, jumped to his feet and said he would go and tell the Emperor of the talk of traitors. Han Kew Sul was allowed to leave the room and then was gripped by the Japanese secretary of the legation, thrown into a side room, and threatened with death. Even Marquis Ito went out to him to persuade him. "Would you not yield," the marquis said, "if your Emperor commanded you?" "No," said Han Kew Sul, "not even then!"

"'This was enough. The marquis at once went to the Emperor. "Han Kew Sul is a traitor," he said. "He defies you and declares that he will not obey your commands."

"'Meanwhile the remaining ministers waited in the cabinet chamber. Where was their leader, the man who had urged them all to resist to death? Minute after minute passed, and still he did not return. Then a whisper went round that the Japanese had killed him. The harsh voices of the Japanese grew still more strident. Courtesy and restraint were thrown off. "Agree with us and be rich, or oppose us and perish." Pak Che Sun, the foreign minister, one of the best and most capable of Korean statesmen, was the last to yield. But even he finally gave way. In the early hours of the morning commands were issued that the seal of state should be brought from the foreign minister's apartment and a treaty should be signed. Here another difficulty arose. The custodian of the seal had received orders in advance that, even if his master commanded, the seal was not to be surrendered for any such purpose. When telephonic orders were sent to him he refused to bring the seal along, and special messengers had to be dispatched to take it from him by force. The Emperor himself asserts to this day that he did not consent.'

"NOTICE TO POWERS OF FRAUD IN PROCURING TREATIES.

"If we were to discuss this subject independently, we would repeat much that has already been said. In the treatment of other phases of this matter we have necessarily referred to Korea's official and unofficial protests to the powers and to her appeals for protection under the clauses of her treaties with those powers of amity and commerce. Korea's case has never been decided by any of the powers. She has never been permitted to even present her case. Her appeals and her protests are nevertheless notice of her rights. She did all that she could, and those notices and those appeals amount to an international lis pendens.

"However the nations, particularly the United States, may have dealt with Japan with respect to Korea, since the asserted protectorate of Japan over Korea, those dealings have been with full notice of Korea's claims and subject to her rights.

"The fact that the United States, or other nations, may or may not have erroneously accepted Japan's false announcement of November 22, 1905, that the alleged protectorate was with the consent of Korea is not material. To persist in a wrong course, to persist in assisting Japan in a wrong course after we know it is wrong, is to become particeps criminis to the original wrong and injury. We might be excused, or we might be forgiven, for our error in originally accepting Japan's false statement without proof, but we can not be excused and we can not be forgiven if we persist in that erroneous action after learning the falsity of Japan.

"Must the Government of the United States sit idly by and see this monstrous thing ruthlessly and cold-bloodedly executed without remonstrance or protest, when our mere remonstrance or mere protest, emphatically voiced, would shame and awe Japan, by its very moral force and strength, into undoing the international crime against Korea that it has committed and would save a nation of 19,000,000 souls from bondage and extinction?

"Korea, it may seem to us, in her simplicity, does not believe in the use of armed force. She has delighted to call her country the land of the 'Morning Calm,' significant of that morning hour of refreshed being, when all is peace and contentment, and significant of the passive, contemplative, and kindly spirit of her people. She believes that moral strength and justice are superior to brute force and materialism. Who are we, that we should say that she is not right?

"Korea does not ask for arms and ammunition with which to assert her rights. She does not ask that we or that any of the powers intervene to protect her by force. She asks only that we give her the moral strength that comes from the assertion of a righteous sentiment by a nation that is known to be just, impartial, and unselfish. We can do no less.

"FACTS—THE INDEPENDENT MOVEMENT.

"In spite of the passive, contemplative, nonresisting, and kindly characteristics of the whole Korean people, it was impossible that this aggression and domination by Japanese should not be resented. There were many uprisings at points where Japanese brutality, arrogance, and aggression were particularly active. These were always met by ruthless methods of oppression, and even up to the time of the death of the old Emperor, on January 24 of this year, there had been much bloodshed by patriotic Koreans.

"Instilled with 4,000 years of inherited love for ancestry and tradition, no organized effort was made to restore independence, many factions fearing that this would result in injury or torture to their old beloved Emperor.

"It would seem that they were patiently and passively waiting for the time to come when the old Emperor should be beyond the avenging hand of Japan.

"Subsequent events prove this to be literally true. Immediately upon his death all restraint was removed, and the Koreans, with a unanimity, determined purpose, and organizing ability that astonished the world, rose up as one voice for their 19,000,000 people and proclaimed their restored independence.

"The sincerity, determination, and ability with which this movement was conducted is all the more appreciated when the circumstances are known. The Koreans had no newspapers, their printing presses had been confiscated; they were under the strictest form of police surveillance and censorship; every Korean was registered by the police, and he was obliged to give a strict account of his whereabouts at all times, and no gatherings of Koreans of over five in number were permitted by the police without their sanction or presence. Yet, in spite of all this, communications and notices were in some way mimeographed or duplicated, and the people did meet and did confer. This was all carefully done with the utmost secrecy, not even their friends the missionaries having an inkling of what was transpiring. They organized in every precinct and in every district of Korea, determined upon the exact wording of their declaration of independence, and somehow at some place they procured and distributed copies of the document to every precinct in Korea. In the meantime they selected 33 representative men to sign the document, and it is evidence of their ideas of justice and fair play that they selected as such representative men 15 Christians, 15 members of the Heavenly Way Society, and 3 Buddhists. With a thoroughness and intelligent attention to detail that would do credit to any of our own best constitutional lawyers, they arranged for the day and hour when the declaration of restored independence should be publicly read in every city and precinct in Korea. March 1 was fixed as the day and 2 o'clock as the hour upon which the declaration was to be read, and it was arranged that simultaneously with the reading of the declaration copies should be delivered to Korean boys disguised as Japanese newsboys to be distributed to all the people. Promptly on the day and hour the 33 representatives elected to sign the declaration formally executed it, and it was read, and the boys distributed it as arranged. Many of the readers were shot down, but there was always some one in the crowd at another point who took up the reading where it was stopped. Many of these patriotic boys met their death, but there was always another boy to carry out the program. But all of this is better told by eyewitnesses. Mr. V. M. McClatchy, editor of the Sacramento Bee, was in Seoul, Korea, at the time of this demonstration, and he is one of the many messengers who brought back to America a copy of that declaration. Upon his return he published in his paper a graphic account of the demonstration under the title 'Greatest example in world history of organized passive resistance for an ideal.'

"'Suddenly, on the Saturday preceding the funeral, March 1, at 2 p. m., without warning or hint to the foreign population and without suspicion evidently on the part of the Japanese ruler, there was inaugurated in every large city of Korea on behalf of its 20,000,000 subject people a peaceful demonstration and demand for national independence. This demonstration continued in various forms throughout the Korean Peninsula up to the date of our departure from Yokohama March 17. Since that time the veil which conceals or distorts happenings in the Far East has dropped for us as it has for all westerners.

"'In Seoul the demonstration consisted of a reading of the proclamation in a public park; of the rushing of many thousands of white-robed Koreans down the wide main street, shouting "Mansei," the Korean equivalent to the Japanese "Banzai"; exhortations to the students of the various schools to join in the demonstration and to maintain a peaceful agitation until they secured national freedom and an attempt to enter the palace gates and present a petition to young Prince Yi, etc.

"'The police and gendarmes could not stop the crowd at first, but soldiers were called out, and clubbed muskets and swords were used effectively, over 150 prisoners being taken to jail that afternoon, some of them rather severely injured. Somewhat similar demonstrations were made on Monday and on Wednesday; but they did not last long, the Japanese being prepared, and several hundred demonstrators being made prisoners, among them some girl students. The demonstrations in other cities took on a similar character.

"'The vernacular press of Japan during the first week of the demonstration was filled with accounts from several special correspondents, declaring that in Seoul and elsewhere throughout the peninsula the Koreans had attacked, injured, and even killed gendarmes, police, and soldiers and injured property. Up to the morning of March 6, when we left Seoul, I am confident that no such thing occurred in that city, and I have reasons to believe it did not occur elsewhere. The most conclusive evidence on this point is the interview published in the Japan Advertiser by the Japanese minister of communication, Noda, who, with other high officials of the Government, went to Seoul to attend the funeral of the former Emperor Yi. Noda did not leave Seoul until March 5, and his interview, published on his return to Tokyo, declared that the Koreans had not committed acts of violence or injured property either in Seoul or anywhere else in Korea.

"'On the morning on which we left Seoul, five days after the demonstration commenced, there appeared on posts and walls a second proclamation from the Korean leaders, though unsigned, in which the people were congratulated on the manner in which they had testified to Japan and to the world their desire to be free and on the self-control and forbearance with which they had endured injury and arrest. They were reminded that as Koreans they must stand up for the sacred cause to the last man, and they were cautioned again to do no violence and no injury to property. "He who does this," the proclamation said, "is an enemy to his country and will most seriously injure the cause."

"'Meanwhile, the Koreans had carried on the policy of passive resistance by closing up all the schools, the Korean children having ceased to attend, and by ceasing work in the various public utility and manufacturing enterprises.'

"Mr. J. A. Armstrong, secretary of the board of foreign missions of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, was in Seoul as late as March 17. His description follows:

"'During those two days in Seoul I saw, read, and learned much about the Korean revolution for independence. (I spent three months in Korea in the latter half of 1918 and was therefore somewhat informed as to the conditions which made the people dissatisfied with Japanese rule.) The "adequate reason" was that the missionaries desired that, as a missionary secretary was about to leave for North America, I should know the facts about the movement. Press dispatches are both meager and inaccurate, a fact which should be kept in mind when reading what may come over the cables to our papers. It is unwise for anyone in Korea to send any facts through the mails because of censorship. Only by travelers can the truth reach the outside world, even Japan itself.

"'What I learned roused my indignation and sympathy—indignation at the cruel treatment given the Koreans by Japanese police and soldiers; sympathy for an oppressed and defenseless people crying out for justice. I hope to prepare a fuller statement later, and shall therefore set down here only a few points which should be noted.

"'1. Missionaries and other foreigners in Korea were as ignorant about the plans of the Koreans as the Japanese themselves. The civil authorities acknowledge this, but the military and the Japanese press in Japan charge the missionaries with instigating the uprising.

"'2. It did not originate in mission schools, as alleged, though they are in it, as Government schools are.

"'3. Foreigners marvel at the ability and thoroughness with which the Koreans organized and are carrying on the campaign. Even the oldest British and American citizens had no idea that the Koreans were capable of planning and conducting such a widespread rebellion.

"'4. Their methods are those of passive resistance, that no violence be used nor resistance offered to arrest. They, even schoolgirls, go to prison singing, cheering, and shouting "Mansei" (Japanese "Banzai," lit., ten thousand times ten thousand years). This cry, or, as it is sometimes expressed, "Tongnip Mansei" (independence forever), has united the whole nation.'

"We might pursue this line of statement indefinitely, but it would be mere repetition and cumulative.

"What we have quoted, however, emphasizes what we have had occasion to say before, that the Koreans are using no force; they believe implicitly in the strength of moral force as against brute force, and is it not possible that they are more enlightened than many of their brothers of the white race?

"Following the passing of this declaration for restored independence, and with the same thoroughness and attention to detail, they elected delegates to a constitutional convention. These delegates, in order that they might not be disturbed, met secretly until they had as between themselves agreed upon a constitution for the government of Korea; then determined upon April 23, 1919, as the date and upon Seoul, Korea, as the place for the formal public meeting of their convention and election of officers. With no printing presses, the type for their constitution was hand carved on blocks of wood and copies were taken from these wooden blocks. When the time came for the holding of the convention it was held at the time and place appointed and the constitution adopted, and Dr. Syngman Rhee was elected president, and other executive officers were duly elected at the same time.

"Their declaration of independence and their constitution is as near our own as the circumstances and conditions in Korea will permit. They declare for and provide for free speech, freedom of religion, and give every Korean—man and woman alike—the right to vote.

"This similarity is not to be wondered at, in view of the fact that the majority of the members of the Korean National Council and the representative officers of the new Korean republic have been graduated from American colleges and universities. They have studied, with oriental thoroughness, all of the different forms of government, and it is no small compliment that they should pattern after the United States.

"In strong contrast to the ideal treatment of the situation by the Koreans, is the positively low, brutal, atrocious treatment of the situation by the Japanese, which we shall now comment on.

"FACTS—ATROCITIES.

"This subhead has reference to the proof of inhuman, bestial, wanton, and willful brutality of the Japanese toward the Koreans.

"The evidence of these atrocities is already before the Senate and will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 15, 1919, pages 2594 and 2595; July 17, 1919, pages 2697 to 2717; July 18, 1919, page 2816; and August 18, 1919, pages 3924 to 3926.

"Thousands have been murdered; more thousands have been wounded and maimed, and still many more thousands have been imprisoned and tortured; churches have been burned; whole villages have been reduced to ruins; women have been outraged and beaten, and even the hands of little children have been cut off, because those tiny hands held aloof the flag of their country.

"The record before you contains the direct, first hand, eyewitness proof of 361 of those murders; time, place, and circumstance. The same record gives you the same detail with reference to 860 wounded and maimed men. You find there direct proof of the burning of churches and destruction of villages. Eyewitnesses and victims themselves tell you how young women and girls were stripped naked and were beaten and flogged, and how their trembling bodies, perspiring from terror and pain, were dashed with pails of cold water; how their fingers were tied together and then pulled out of joint, and how they were then packed into cells, men and women together, with no ventilation or sanitation. The record tells you how the hospitals were forbidden to care for the wounded, and what indignities and punishments were meted out to Americans and others who dared to assist the wounded, or care for the dead.

"This record comes from a source that can not be disputed. Realizing that Japan had isolated Korea from the world by a rigid censorship, the men who brought you this information took their lives in their hands and their integrity and truthfulness is vouched for by America's best and most upright citizens.

"All of these brutalities and atrocities can not be told. Many of them will never be told. They lie buried in the ashes of ruined villages; have passed into mortal oblivion along with the sanity of grief-crazed women or lie locked in the breast of the guilty man who perpetrated the outrage.

"All these things did not occur in the heat of battle. The excitement of mortal combat did not blind men's senses and deprive them of an appreciation of their acts. It was cold-blooded, premeditated, methodical, ruthless brutality.

"We are appalled spectators, seeing the Koreans a people with no arms, no ammunition, and no weapons of any kind, for the time being helpless before the Japanese, with guns, ammunition, and all modern weapons and instruments of death and destruction.

"We see a reign of terror that has only one close parallel in history—Belgium. Parallel only in some respects, for Belgium had guns, ammunition, and modern weapons of warfare. She was able to, and did, fight back, defending every inch of her territory.

"We see back of Korea her 4,000 years of national existence and independence and the moral force that goes with right and justice. We see back of Japan only the materialistic brute force of an imperial autocracy.

"We are horrified. How long can Japanese autocracy withstand the contempt that must lie in the heart of her own people and in the hearts of the peoples of all nations? The great battle is on between moral force and brute force, and we wonder whether all this is not for some great purpose—to show the world the necessity for ending all autocracy and imperialism.

"In their patient, persistent way the Koreans were insisting upon the God-given right of free speech, humbly believing that if the world but knew their condition and the injustices to which they were being subjected, that somewhere, some place, all these things would be righted. They plead only for a hearing. Who can say but that their way was best? The world has heard. Japan must now receive the verdict and abide the sentence.

"IN CONCLUSION.

"This Korean question, as presented by the facts that we have referred to, presents situations and conditions of strong contrast.

"The Koreans, with their modern republican form of government, representative in character, which stands for the right of self-determination; the Japanese, with their ancient autocratic government, militaristic to the core, believing in the divine right of emperors.

"The idealism of the Korean, believing implicitly in passive resistance only and that right and justice will prevail eventually by sheer force of moral strength, as opposed to the Japanese view that might and selfish desire make right and that all things are accomplished by brute force.

"We have no choice as to the side upon which we must array ourselves. It can not be on the side of the exponents of autocracy and brute force.

"Korea has been shamefully wronged and outraged. We must not permit this shameful outrage to continue, especially if by mere announcement of our position and attitude we can be the means and moral force that will rectify this wrong.

"Korea does not ask us to physically intervene. Her kindly spirit would be troubled if we were to make any physical sacrifices in her behalf. All she asks is that we say to Japan that you have been and that you are treating Korea in a shameful and wrongful manner, and that unless you desist and rectify these wrongs by restoring Korean independence you will be despised and ostracised by all nations.

"Respectfully submitted.

"FRED A. DOLPH,
"Counselor to the Republic of Korea."

OFFICE OF ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably without amendment Senate resolution 172, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let the resolution be first read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CALDER on the 22d ultimo, as follows:

Whereas the trading-with-the-enemy act passed by Congress, approved on the 6th day of October, 1917, provided for the office of Alien Property Custodian; and

Whereas under such authorization the President appointed A. Mitchell Palmer, who held the position until the 3d day of March, 1919, at which time he was succeeded by Francis P. Garvan; and

Whereas in the conduct of said office they have administered upon nearly 40,000 separate estates or trusts, having an aggregate value of nearly $1,000,000,000; and

Whereas under the provisions of said act they have exercised the right to make numerous appointments of lawyers, directors, supervisors, clerks, assistants, and accountants, and have exercised the right to fix, allow, and pay to the individuals so appointed by them such compensation as they might determine, and have exercised the right to designate numerous banks and trust companies as depositaries of the proceeds of sale of alien property which has come into their possession; and

Whereas the President on or about October 12, 1917, vested in the Alien Property Custodian "the executive administration of all of the provisions of section 7 (a), section 7 (c), and section 7 (d) of the trading-with-the-enemy act," including, among other things, the power "to require the conveyance, transfer, assignment, delivery, or payment to himself at such time and in such manner as he shall prescribe, of any moneys or other properties owing to or belonging to or held for, by, or on account of, or on behalf of, or for the benefit of any enemy or ally of an enemy * * * which, after an investigation, said Alien Property Custodian shall determine is so owing, or so belongs, or is so held"; and

Whereas under the provisions of subdivision C of section 7 of trading-with-the-enemy act "no person shall be liable in any court for or in respect to anything done or omitted in pursuance of any order, rule, or regulation by the President under the authority of this act"; and

Whereas it is possible that after peace shall have been declared, claims may be made against the United States for the recovery of moneys and for the value of property which it may be alleged have been taken by the Alien Property Custodian without authority; and

Whereas any bond which has been furnished by the Alien Property Custodian, if any such bond has been furnished, can under the circumstances provide for a penalty of not more than a nominal amount; and

Whereas said A. Mitchell Palmer has publicly declared his desire that his administration of the office of Alien Property Custodian be fully investigated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That a special committee be selected by the Senate, to consist of five Senators, three of whom shall be members of the majority party and two of the minority party, which committee is hereby directed to examine and audit the accounts of said A. Mitchell Palmer, Alien Property Custodian, and of said Francis P. Garvan, as Alien Property Custodian, and to investigate the administration by them of said office from the date of their respective appointments to the present time; and be it further

Resolved, That said committee be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to proceed with such investigation without unnecessary delay, to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths; to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in pursuance hereof; to sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate at any place, either Washington, D. C., or elsewhere, as may be deemed proper by the committee; to employ such counsel and expert and other assistants as may be deemed necessary by the committee; to report its conclusions to the Senate as speedily as possible, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not desire to object to the consideration of the resolution at this time. An objection would carry it over until to-morrow, and I think this morning is just as good a time to dispose of the resolution as to-morrow would be; but I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution, and then, after the amendment shall have been considered, I may have a motion to make for the further disposition of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate by unanimous consent proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I offer the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk to be added at the end of the resolution. I ask that the amendment be read.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if this resolution is coming up for consideration—and there seems to be an amendment to be offered to it—I should like to ask that the resolution be again read. At the time of its reading I was not paying any particular attention, as I did not suppose it would be considered this morning. I should like, therefore, to have the resolution again read, if there is no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. CALDER. May I suggest that the Secretary do no read the preamble of the resolution, but merely the resolution itself?

Mr. BORAH. Let the resolution be read in its entirety.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the resolution, the following provisos:

Provided, That no person shall be employed by said committee as counsel, accountant, or other expert assistant who has at any time represented, been employed by, or who is interested in any way for any person, firm, or corporation whose property has been demanded or taken over by the Alien Property Custodian, or who has been interested in any claim of any character against the Alien Property Custodian; and

Provided further, That no expense shall be incurred by said committee for the employment of accountants to make examinations of any of the trusts being administered by the Alien Property Custodian, or any of the firms or corporations under his management or control, in cases where such accounts have heretofore been examined and certified by registered certified accountants.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CALDER. As the mover of the resolution, I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I presume the amendment will have to be voted on, but I am glad the Senator from New York accepts it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment to the resolution is agreed to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is detained from the Senate by his duties in connection with the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations investigating Mexican affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a matter of procedure here upon which I have expressed some views on previous occasions, and that is the matter of passing resolutions of this character without consideration by any committee of the advisability of the matters contained in the resolution.

We all know that we have been passing resolutions of this character day after day, and no consideration whatever has been given by any committee of the Senate as to the advisability of doing the thing called for by the resolution. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate does not assume to pass upon the merits of these resolutions. Upon various occasions resolutions of this character have been referred to that committee, and the Senators proposing the resolutions have specifically protested against that committee making any investigation as to the advisability of the adoption of the resolutions. One notable instance was in the case of the resolution proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to examine into an explosion which took place in that State. As a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and the acting chairman of the committee at that time, I proposed that we ascertain from the War Department what was being done to find out the causes for that explosion. The Senator from New Jersey protested against the committee getting any information from any source, and so it has been with every resolution which has been presented up to this time. No committee of the Senate has passed upon the merits of these resolutions, and the same may be said of this resolution.

The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate did not assume to investigate in any respect the question as to whether or not such a resolution as this should be passed. No attempt was made by that committee even to approximate the expense of such an investigation as this. This resolution calls for an audit of all the transactions of the present Alien Property Custodian and his predecessor, and the employment of experts and assistants and counsel without limitation. There is no suggestion here, no information, as to how much this investigation is going to cost, nor is there anything before the Senate to show the effect of this investigation if it is had. We know that it deals with the property taken by the Alien Property Custodian from German citizens. We do not know how far the evidence which will be produced in this investigation will be utilized by Germany and German citizens against this country of ours. None of these things have been investigated, and I want to enter my earnest protest against the passage of any resolution of this kind without any investigation by some committee as to the advisability of the expenditures called for.

Mr. President, I move that this resolution as amended be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from New Mexico has made a motion to refer this resolution to the Judiciary Committee, and I also understand that that is a debatable question. Is that a debatable question—a motion to refer it to the Judiciary Committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that that motion is not debatable during the morning hour.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose, then, that the Senator was out of order when he was debating it.

Mr. THOMAS. He debated it before he made it.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to make a suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent to make a suggestion. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator what the length of his suggestion will be?

Mr. BORAH. It is not going to be very long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that the Chair will not take him from the floor unless a point of order is made.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I will venture for a few moments upon the experiment.

I desired to say that I am rather in sympathy with the view of the Senator from New Mexico. We are constantly passing resolutions of investigation, and expending a vast amount of time and funds in the investigation, and that ends the matter. In other words, investigations very generally—not always but very generally—are ways of easing the matter out of public sight and public attention, and with the report interest in the matter dies. If I could feel that this was going to be an established rule, a permanent precedent, I should feel in entire sympathy with the matter; but is this to be applied simply to this particular resolution, and then are we to abandon the program hereafter and proceed along the lines which we have heretofore adopted?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am in sympathy with what the Senator has said. I am not apprehensive about the result of an investigation of this matter, because it has already been investigated by the Judiciary Committee pretty conclusively and pretty satisfactorily; but I want to say this:

Heretofore for many years the contingent fund of the Senate has run about $25,000 a year to take care of the contingent expenses. We have spent a good deal already in this Congress, and as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I find that the accounting officer of the Senate, Mr. Pace, has before us now items that aggregate $135,000 for additional contingent fund to carry us until December, caused by these investigations. In this matter of investigation the Alien Property Custodian now has some bonded accountants—which means the regular bonded accountants who must make their returns under oath—going over every book and scrap of paper in his office, and within 60 or 90 days they probably will have finished their report. This resolution contemplates that that shall all be done over again.

Mr. THOMAS. What would it cost?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that the cost of that procedure will be somewhere between $150,000 and $200,000, to hire another set of bonded accountants to do what one set is doing now. Therefore I am in sympathy with the motion of the Senator from New Mexico, that we refer the resolution to the Judiciary Committee and give them a chance to investigate it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator would not make that statement after the Senate has adopted his amendment to the resolution, because his amendment provides that wherever a certified accountant has already passed upon the accounts no part of the funds shall be used for that purpose; so there could not be a duplication of the investigation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I am talking about the original purpose of the resolution. I offered my amendment to guard against that particular proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. And that has been agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That part of it has been agreed to, except that up to this time the accountants have not made any report, so they have not come within the terms of the amendment; and if the resolution passed, those in charge of the investigation could go out right now and employ some more accountants to start on this work. I think it is very much wiser, for that reason, to let the resolution go to the committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask this question: I prefer to ask it, perhaps, of the Senator in charge of the resolution. Supposing this investigation is had, what does the Senator hope to realize from it in the way of results?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, this resolution refers to a great bureau of the Government, a bureau that has taken over nearly a billion dollars' worth of property. Over 40,000 concerns are involved. There is no law permitting anyone to check up what this bureau has done. I have not attacked the Alien Property Custodian's office, nor did I seek to prevent the confirmation of Mr. Palmer as Attorney General; but if one-fourth of the charges made to me personally about the conduct of the business of that office are true, then it is a blot upon the fair fame of this Nation. What I want to find out is whether these charges are true.

I want to find out whether or not there has been collusion between men in this office and those outside of it. I am not interested in protecting Germans or obtaining information for them, although one would believe that I was from the statement made recently by Mr. Palmer in the newspapers. I am anxious to find out if that office was honestly conducted and whether or not men made vast sums of money because of their friendship with the Alien Property Custodian or his assistants.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator from New York allow me to interrupt him to ask him a question? Were not all the rumors and charges the Senator has heard about made before a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee and an extended hearing had on the subject; and did not the committee report adversely to the whole thing and give a unanimous report in the other direction?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, many of the charges that have been brought to my attention were not referred to that committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why were they not laid before the committee?

Mr. CALDER. They were of such a character that they could not be, effectively, without subpœnaing witnesses and cross-examining them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then does not that lead the Senator to the proposition that it is very much better to refer this to the Judiciary Committee, which already has information on the subject, let the Senator go before that committee and present these charges, and let them determine whether there is sufficient in the charges to warrant the expenditure of two or three hundred thousand dollars in an investigation before we go into all these expenses of investigation?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the expenditure of $100,000——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho still further yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. The expenditure of $100,000 or $200,000, or even more than that, would be a splendid investment for the Government if we could obtain information that would either demonstrate the truth of these repeated assertions or show their falsehood.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I am not quite in sympathy, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, with the idea of referring this matter to the Judiciary Committee. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee is not here, and I do not profess to speak at all for the chairman or for the Judiciary Committee, but one phase of the matter has been before a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, of which I was a member. We did not think that it was within the scope of the authority of the subcommittee to go into any thorough investigation of the acts of the Alien Propery Custodian. We examined some evidence in regard to special cases that were submitted, and reported favorably on the nomination of Mr. Palmer as Attorney General under the evidence that we had. We did not feel that we could go into the whole subject of the Alien Property Custodian's acts, and hence did not. We did not feel that we had the authority to do so. Witnesses were not subpœnaed, although witnesses appeared voluntarily before the committee. If there is to be an investigation, I think it would be better, as the matter now stands, to refer it to a select committee, as provided by the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator was on this subcommittee?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. And the subcommittee made considerable investigation?

Mr. STERLING. We examined the evidence that was submitted to us. We heard testimony in regard to two great properties which had come under the jurisdiction of the custodian. We heard the custodian's statement and explanation in regard to those properties, their management, their sale, and their entire disposition.

Mr. BORAH. After this investigation the subcommittee reported favorably upon the nomination?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. That must have been, then, for the reason that so far as the subcommittee proceeded it found nothing objectionable in the facts.

Mr. STERLING. We found nothing that went to the qualifications of Mr. Palmer for the office of Attorney General of the United States. We found nothing so far as ability and integrity are concerned so far as we went, and hence our report.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from New York to say that the charges in relation to the administration of the Alien Property Custodian's office which had come to his knowledge affect the question of the honesty with which the office was administered. Charges are made of collusion in sales of property. Mr. President, that was the very matter which the committee had under consideration and the subject inquired into. The committee did not feel called upon, as suggested by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], to inquire into the question whether excellent business wisdom was exercised in the disposition of the property or generally in the management of the office. It did feel, however, compelled to go into any charges that were made that in any manner reflected upon the honesty with which the office was administered by Mr. Palmer, whose nomination was under consideration. Again and again the members declared that if there was any testimony which indicated collusion in the sale of the property upon the part of the Alien Property Custodian, or anyone over whom he seemed to have charge, the committee was desirous of hearing anything that could be offered along those lines, and the committee did hear everything that was offered.

Undoubtedly many complaints have been made to the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. But by whom? Undoubtedly the German owners of this property bitterly complain as to the acts of the Alien Property Custodian. But the very serious question is, From what sources do these complaints come? Mr. President, for aught the Senate knows at this time every one of these complaints emanates from some German owner whose property has been taken over, and, of course, he feels bitterly about the matter. Why should it not be referred to some committee of the Senate to ascertain the sources, at least, from which these complaints come, to see whether any American interest of any kind is complaining of the administration of the office?

But I say again to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that the committee having the matter in charge did feel called upon to go into the consideration of any suggestion emanating from any source, whatever it was, as to the honesty and integrity with which the office of the Alien Property Custodian was administered.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to inquire of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] in regard to a phase of the question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. CALDER. Were not requests made of the committee to subpœna witnesses and call for the production of documents before the committee, so that witnesses and papers might be examined?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be glad to give the Senator full information about that. The matter to which the Senator from New York refers is simply this: A Mr. Lewis, said to have been formerly an attorney general of the State of New York, appeared and laid before the committee facts in relation to the disposition of the property of the Bosch Magneto Co. He was heard at length and gave us all the information he had on the subject. I may say, in this connection, that he reported to us, in the first place, that under the law the Alien Property Custodian had no power to dispose of the property at all; that he had no authority under the law to dispose of any property except such as was perishable in character. Subsequently he was compelled to come before the committee and admit that he was all wrong about it; that an amendment of the act had been passed subsequently which authorized the disposition of the property.

But after having told all about it, he was interrogated as to whom he represented, and he told us he represented a Mr.

Andrews, a lawyer who was with him before the committee. He was speaking for him, he said, because Mr. Andrews was quite deaf, and was unable himself to follow the proceedings. He represented to us that Mr. Andrews was a stockholder in the company, or, rather, had a contract under which he was to have certain stocks; that he had a large claim against the company, and therefore he was interested in the disposition of its property.

The committee then heard Mr. Palmer upon it; he went into the whole subject, and I may say that the bottom fell out of the whole thing. Those who made the charges were in a pitiable plight before the committee, pitiable for the reason, if for no other, that the man Andrews, who was the client of Mr. Lewis, was shown to have come before the Bosch Magneto Co. making a claim for large amounts due him on account of services to the company, when a check for $500 was produced, with a receipt on the back of it of Mr. Andrews to the effect that he had received that $500 check in full payment and discharge of any claim of any kind or description, past, present, or future, against the Bosch Magneto Co. Therefore, he was absolutely without any right in the premises at all. Under those circumstances, Mr. Lewis requested the committee that a subpœna be issued requiring the Alien Property Custodian to produce all the books and papers in his possession formerly belonging to the Bosch Magneto Co. He was asked what he expected to prove by those papers if they were brought, but he declined to say what he expected to prove, and the committee declined to order the books and papers produced. That is the whole story.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question. Under the facts stated, if that had been a proceeding in court, would not the court have taken the same action that the Judiciary Committee took?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I hesitate to criticize a committee of the Senate. The committee having this matter under advisement were inquiring into the fitness of Mr. Palmer for the position of Attorney General; they were inquiring into his character and general reputation, and they were not appointed to investigate the affairs of the Alien Property Custodian. I felt myself that they should have called for those books and papers and have brought out all the facts and circumstances; but they thought differently. I have not been quarreling about the confirmation of Mr. Palmer. I make no personal attack upon his character or integrity. I have no knowledge that he has done a wrong thing intentionally, but I submit——

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me to ask the Senator from New York a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator from New York, under all the facts that have been stated in connection with the subject this morning, object to the appropriate committee of the Senate determining whether there should be an investigation as called for by the resolution?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, if this resolution were to be referred to the appropriate committee, that committee would be the Committee on Commerce. The Committee on Commerce prepared the trading-with-the-enemy bill, reported it to the Senate, and had charge of it on the floor of this body. But, Mr. President, the subject of the investigation of the Alien Property Custodian's office has been under consideration here in the mind of every Senator for months.

I understand that the Attorney General, the former Alien Property Custodian, is anxious to have the investigation. I can not conceive why Senators on the other side of the Chamber should put anything in the way of a thorough and complete investigation of that office by a committee of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for another question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from New York knows, of course, that many of the matters relating to this subject have been, in a way, investigated by the Committee on the Judiciary. I repeat my question, Does the Senator from New York object to the motion made by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], that the resolution be referred to the Judiciary Committee for the purpose of determining whether it is advisable that the investigation called for by the resolution be held?

Mr. CALDER. I do, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why does the Senator from New York object?

Mr. CALDER. Because a subcommittee of that committee, and the full committee itself, have had the matter under advisement.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then the Senator from New York thinks that the Judiciary Committee, as constituted, is an unfair tribunal to determine that question?

Mr. CALDER. Oh, no, Mr. President; I make no reflection upon the committee. I have made no reflection upon their reporting favorably on Mr. Palmer's nomination for Attorney General. But this is a matter completely apart from the work of that committee, and I believe the time to determine that question is here and now.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator from Idaho yield for a further question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from New York realizes, of course, that the passage of a resolution of this character, particularly after the statements that have been made by him this morning, is a reflection upon a high officer of the Government. The Senator realizes that the Senate would not pass a resolution of this character unless it had determined that there is a necessity for the investigation for which the resolution calls.

Mr. CALDER. I have made no personal reflection upon the Attorney General.

Mr. ROBINSON. The question I am asking the Senator is if he does not realize that the resolution itself, coupled with the statements which he has made, constitutes a reflection upon a high officer of the Government?

Mr. CALDER. No; I think not.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator does not mean to say that when charges of dishonesty or corruption or inefficiency are made against an officer of the Government, and those charges are recognized by the Senate and a resolution is adopted, that that does not of itself constitute a quasi finding of the Senate that there is sufficient foundation for the charges to justify an investigation of them? In view of all the facts, in view of the proceedings which have heretofore taken place in the Senate, in view of proceedings that have taken place elsewhere with which the Senator is familiar, does not the Senator think that the fair thing to do, the thing that is fair to the Attorney General of the United States, the proper thing for the Senate to do, the thing that is fair to the Senate, is to let a committee of this body, in which the Senate has confidence, determine whether or not the United States shall spend a hundred thousand dollars or more in an investigation of the character contemplated by his resolution? And if the Senator does not feel that way about it, is it not due to the fact that he has heretofore presented to a great committee of this body substantially the same charges that he now makes, and that committee found against him, vindicated Mr. Palmer upon every charge of corruption, dishonesty, and inefficiency, and now the Senator wants to continue the controversy, harass the officer, and embarrass the Senate? In view of the fact that the Judiciary Committee, in a former proceeding took jurisdiction of the subject matter of the resolution, what can be the objection of the Senator from New York, unless he impeaches either the integrity or the competency of the Judiciary Committee, to that committee passing upon the advisability of making the investigation?

Mr. CALDER and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield first to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. The question asked by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is a question addressed not alone to the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], but it is addressed to any Senator who might feel disposed to vote for the resolution. I shall vote for the resolution——

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator from South Dakota object to a committee of the Senate first investigating the advisability of adopting the resolution; and if so, why does he object? Does the Senator object to the Judiciary Committee passing upon the question as to whether this investigation should be made?

Mr. STERLING. I can not help thinking, Mr. President, that a reference of the resolution now to a committee for the purpose of determining whether there should be an investigation or not is unnecessary. I put it primarily on the ground that the Senate can determine, without reference to a committee, whether such an investigation should be had.

Now, coming to the question suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, in voting for this resolution I cast no reflection whatever upon the Attorney General, either as Attorney General or as Alien Property Custodian; but here is property worth nearly a billion of dollars; here are 40,000 distinct properties involved, and the Attorney General himself has courted an investigation. He stated before the subcommittee that he would welcome an investigation.

I think for less causes and where a less amount was involved investigations have been had, and that, too, without reflecting upon the officer administering the place or performing the duty. With all this vast amount of property involved, worth nearly a billion dollars, is it not proper that the Senate of the United States should make inquiry, in order that not only the Senate but the people may be satisfied that there has been a proper conduct, a proper administration, of this great office under these circumstances?

The Alien Property Custodian had tremendous power under the trading-with-the-enemy act. Is there to be objection to an inquiry now to be made as to whether this office has been conducted properly or not, wisely or not, and that, too, without any reflection upon the character, the ability, or the integrity of the Attorney General, lately confirmed to that high office?

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The feature of this investigation in which I am most interested is the results which are to follow. In case it is found that the administration has been an unwise administration, is there anything to be had out of the situation other than a condemnation or reflection upon the administration? Can any property rights be recovered? Can any interest be recovered that may have been forfeited or surrendered or unwisely disposed of?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this involves a section of the treaty which I think the Senator will recall, that from this fund are to be taken payments of all prewar claims. This fund is responsible for all those claims, whatever they may be, much or little. Therefore, there is a direct interest of people who have lost vessels or people who went down on the Lusitania, and of the prewar claims in the disposal of this great fund of $1,000,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think I can throw a little light on the disposition of those claims. I am in thorough accord with what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has just said. This was taken as a fund to punish German enemies behind the line for making war on us. But there are two sides to it. Under the treaty this $750,000,000 stands as a trust fund to take care of the claims of American citizens against German interests. But the German Government is undoubtedly trying to break down the status of the Alien Property Custodian fund.

I have in my hand, if the Senator will allow me, because it throws light on it, the report of Mr. Palmer, the Alien Property Custodian's report, which was sent to Germany when published and translated into German and a preface was written to that report. I have the preface in my hand, and it indicates the German attitude in reference to this very matter.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator going to read the preface?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me to read an extract from it, I shall be very glad to do it.

Mr. BORAH. I shall be glad to have the Senator read it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the first place, I want to say that the matter was called to the attention of the American peace commission in Paris by a letter from Mr. Charles B. Dyar, representing the Government, written from Berlin. The letter is dated July 26, 1919. Mr. Dyar, in the letter to the American peace commission, says:

BERLIN, July 26, 1919.

SIRS: I have the honor to transmit herewith for the information of the commission a copy of a translation of the Alien Property Custodian report—

Then follows some German that I can not read; the description of it in German—which has been prepared by the foreign office and published as a public document. This document appears to be intended for use as propaganda and advance copies were sent to all the leading German papers for review. The press comment on the document has been exceedingly bitter.

Particular attention should be called to the introduction to the volume, which is signed Wiedenfeld, which endeavors to excuse the fictive transfers of German property to American citizens in the early years of the war as a perfectly natural measure of precaution at a time when the United States had not yet declared war on Germany, and makes the interesting statement that the idea that the United States would ultimately come into the war if the German successes continued suggested itself naturally to every German business man with interests in America.

Now, this is the point:

The introduction further expresses the hope that the Senate investigation of the administration of the custodian may lead to a review of the entire subject of the treatment of enemy property in the United States. The translation is made from a single copy of the original report which the foreign office succeeded in securing, and which may be consulted by interested parties in Germany. The cost of the German document is 11 marks per copy.

I have the honor to be, sirs,

Your obedient servant, CHARLES B. DYAR.

(Under separate cover copy of A. P. C. report in German.)

I have a copy of that preface to the Alien Property Custodian report in my hand, which I should be very glad in this connection to publish in the RECORD if there is no objection. I desire to read just one sentence from the report showing the attitude of the German Government and the German people in reference to this very investigation.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask a question before the Senator reads that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. What material benefit is to be derived by the German people and those who seem to be fathering this propaganda from this investigation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there will be any, because I think it returns to the point that the German interests are advocating. There were German interests that appeared before the Judiciary Committee and stated clearly what their purpose was. They did not conceal the fact that they wanted to destroy this trust fund for American citizens and get it back in the pockets of the Germans who originally owned it.

Mr. BORAH. That is the question—how could they do it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think they can do it, but I think that question stands behind this whole matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit me to answer the question of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is one way it can be done. Unless the Senate ratifies this treaty, the United States will lose the agreement of Germany for validation of the acts of the Alien Property Custodian, and if that is lost those acts become a natural claim of Germany to be settled by the United States, because there is no warrant for believing that the United States, either through its act of Congress or the act of its Alien Property Custodian, had any right to handle the property of German nationals as we did handle that property, and we can only vindicate ourselves by securing from Germany, as we have done in this treaty, the agreement for the validation of those acts.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that it even goes further than that. There was supposed to be a treaty with the Prussian Government that was afterwards claimed to be ratified and made part of the treaties with this country and the German Imperial Government, by which it was provided that certain care should be taken of the property of two countries if they went to war, German property in this country and American property in Germany, and that certain disposition should be made of it. It is on that basis that the German Government is now claiming and did claim until they signed the treaty on the dotted line in Paris that they had the right to take back the property held by the Alien Property Custodian. That is their claim. But, of course, they waived that under the treaty of peace.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield; and if so, to whom does he yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to be misunderstood in what I have said. I was speaking of no German claim; all I desire to do is to protect the American claimants to this fund.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There can be no objection to that; and that ought to be done.

Mr. LODGE. That is all I desire to do. I do not want the fund to be used up in other ways; I want the American claimants protected. As for the custodian, if he is not protected under this treaty, no words can protect him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly; but——

Mr. LODGE. He is as absolutely protected as anybody can be. It is the one thing in the treaty that is thoroughly taken care of.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the Senator understand that every dollar the Alien Property Custodian has gotten into his hands has gone into Liberty bonds, so that these claims, I think, are protected? If the Senator will allow me, however, I will read a sentence which I have been trying to get to in the preface to the Alien Property Custodian report that I hold in my hand which the Germans sent out. They make this statement:

That the administration of alien property is considered not without suspicion in the United States herself is evident in the action taken by the Senate because of the resolution presented last February by Senators FRELINGHUYSEN and CALDER, demanding an investigation of the Alien Property Custodian because of misappropriation and favoritism. So far as is here known the Senate also has refused to appoint Mr. Palmer as Attorney General. It remains to be seen whether this investigation would not lead to a just inquiry into the management of the alien property and to a fairer judgment of German measures.

I ask that the whole of this paper may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The paper referred to is as follows:

"As in all enemy countries so also in the United States of American the sequestration of enemy property and, above all things, of German property was, as is well known, one of the most important war measures which was taken against the commercial power of Germany. The act of October 6, 1917, relating to trading with the enemy gives the President the authority to appoint a custodian of enemy property. Mr. A. Mitchell Palmer was in fact called to this duty, and we also know that he had at once entered on the execution of the sequestrations on a large scale. We have, however, thus far been extremely uninformed as to the manner in which the sequestration is carried out, upon what principles it is conducted, and what in fact is done with German property. Consequently our authorities could not give information that was in any wise comprehensive to the many questions which were put by German firms and private individuals who, being interested in the custody of wholly legal interests in America, were made uneasy by lack of information. This is now changed. The custodian of enemy property has under date of February 22, 1919, made an exhaustive report to the President of his activities. A copy of this report has come to hand. A partial translation is herewith given German publicity.

"In the translation and printing decided weight was laid on greatest possible speed. With this haste and the difficulties which were met during the printing, owing to the many strikes, it follows that inaccuracies of language must be taken into the bargain. Should any of those interested find anything ambiguous, which only can be cleared up through the original, they may direct definite questions to the Foreign Office (with the addition, A. H. Berlin W. S. Wilhelmstrasse 67a). The original text is at hand in only one copy at present, therefore can not be given out. In answering, a knowledge of this translation will be taken for granted.

"The voluminous work consists in a general, descriptive part and a statistical part. In the general part those passages in which the author concerns himself with a representation of German conditions are for the most part omitted. So far as they are correct they contain nothing new. To a great extent they give information which shows a very far-reaching lack of knowledge of German conditions and manifold—intentional or unintentional—misrepresentations. But for practical purposes, for which naturally the translation can only be followed, they come into consideration only in slight measure. The statements which are necessary for an understanding of the whole proceedings are of course taken up here.

"The tables in the second part are given in the original text. Any translation here where it concerns for the greater part technical expressions would lead to confusing misunderstanding. The expert who has had dealings with America will more easily get the facts in the original than in a translation. The special table of contents makes it easy for every reader to find the part which concerns him. Beyond the direct practical significance which the report certainly has throughout for German interests there is a second page as to its value. Hatefulness and injustice speaks in its representations such as in the war even our opponents who would deny us a belief in common human objectivity did not have its equal. In the translation we must, of course, refrain from taking a position with regard to the enumerable obliquities and falsehoods. A few remarks, however, are proper here to place Mr. Palmer's acts in the right light.

"The fact that the greater part of German property in North America was liquidated and had already before the treaty of peace been sold to purely American interests, Mr. Palmer justifies on the ground that German authorities had previously acted in similar fashion toward American property. But, as a matter of fact, Mr. Palmer must have known, as it was frequently reported to America through neutral channels, that although the German Government allowed itself to resort to reciprocal regulations after gaining information of American measures, that in fact during the whole war no American private or company property was liquidated. The Imperial Government officially put this in conformity to the facts on gaining knowledge of the Palmer report.

"The real motive of the Palmer proceedings comes to expression where this 'custodian' of enemy property declared it to be his task 'to gain hold of and destroy the German industrial army on American soil.' It is significant of the spirit of the whole report that Palmer speaks of an industrial army. But when he declares that the most important German investment in North America had served for the production of war material, and then as proof of this astonishing assumption presents a list of firms which, according to his own statement, principally produce magnetos for motors, woolen cloth for women's clothes, chemical articles such as dyes and farmers' pharmaceutical preparations, surgical instruments, and similar 'necessities of war,' one plainly sees how foundationless is his suspicion. We might assume that war sentiment had not so far suppressed his American readers' power of judgment that they should not recognize the unsoundness of his accusations.

"In another paragraph the report says 'when it is remembered that Germany's hopes for the future laid in the industrial conquest of this continent—a conquest which Germany believed in the year 1914 it was near to—then one may easily recognize * * *.' As proof of this remarkable assumption it is brought forward that the value of German ownership as it appeared on the books of the Palmer administration amounted to an estimated value of $326,855,090.39, the proceeds of 17,339 sequestrations. Besides this the number of undertakings intrusted to him for Germany, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey, all in all, is given at 32,296. Mr. Palmer hopes to obtain therefrom, all told, $700,000,000. That is to say, the highest sum that is estimated for the undertakings of the Central Powers does not reach one-half the value of a single American industrial company such as the United States Steel Corporation and does not approach 1 per cent of the aggregate value of American industry. The report may therefore be doing American enterprise an injustice when he, in face of such a proportion, rises to the expression, 'the development of industry, commerce, and science in this country, which was oppressed and throttled by the attitude of German industrial interests, will now have a free hand.'

"Protest must also be made that the report puts down certain business customs which are common to international big capital and which, particularly in the United States, have been for decades the subject of extended discussions and the cause of legislative measures, as a specialty of German big industry and wholesale business groups. It is then not an accident that in all the world the American expression is used and trust methods are spoken of. The report also overlooks the grounds which lead to the establishment of German industrial plants in America. It was North American custom laws with their known high-tariff provisions which led American interests to call on their German friends—in like measure, of course, on the English and French groups—to erect factories in the United States under the protection of the North American tariff laws. They used to particularly emphasize that the German interests would thereby meet American wishes. This is borne out by the fact that a regular rivalry arose between States and communities where such plants might come in question, free land was offered for the factories, and many other facilities were assured.

"There was never any thought then that foreign capital should forthwith beconfe nationalized, as the report now demands; as also English and French capital has not nationalized itself. A reproach, therefore, from this connection does not lie against our German interest.

"On the other hand, it was a self-understood precaution when in the first years of the war, as the United States had not declared war on Germany, that German property should in a large measure be transferred to Americans. The thought that the United States in the progress of German success would finally enter the war did not lie so far off that every cautious German business man should not seek to protect himself from this danger while there was time. The sale was then so much the more the proper method, since thereby, according to all rules, the war profits still to be gained would be realized.

"Finally, let us call special attention to the fact that the report evidently supposes a reciprocal ultimate regulation of the profit derived from the confiscated property. This, therefore, is the reason for demanding the liquidation of alien property; it should supply the amounts that would satisfy the claims rendered by the citizens of that country against the foreign country.

"How far the measures of the Alien Property Custodian are within the law in individual cases is still left undecided. A number of confiscatory cases have been, according to the report, brought before the courts, and it remains to be seen whether or not the American Supreme Court would declare this procedure as unconstitutional. According to news dispatches, the movement of appealing to courts is growing, since many American citizens are interested in these German-American enterprises and are contesting the legality of this dispossession—executed outside of the regular public-court procedures—as being against the Constitution.

"That the administration of alien property is considered not without suspicion in the United States herself is evident in the action taken by the Senate because of the resolution presented last February by Senators FRELINGHUYSEN and CALDER, demanding an investigation of the Alien Property Custodian because of misappropriation and favoritism. So far as is here known, the Senate also has refused to appoint Mr. Palmer as Attorney General. It remains to be seen whether this investigation would not lead to a just inquiry into the management of the alien property and to a fairer judgment of German measures."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I say and what has been my position all the time—and I do not say this in any way as reflecting on the sentiments or the position of Senators on this floor who want this investigation, for I know that it is no reflection on them—is that the action of the Senate is misleading to the German mind. It makes German interests believe that there may be an open door for them to break through and get this fund. If there ever was a righteous act done, it was taking this money away from the German junker classes, who were promoting unrighteous war against this country.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, to that we all agree, but we want to preserve the fund for our countrymen.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If that is so, why should we not follow the suggestion? This does not come from Mr. Palmer. Mr. Palmer did not want an investigation by interests that were adverse; but that is provided for in the amendments I have sent to the desk. So far as he is personally concerned, I know he has no objection to the investigation; I think the investigation would show vastly to his credit; but what I have in mind is that the written records of the Senate show that lawyers representing German interests amounting to millions of dollars have been before the Senate and will continue to be before Congress in an effort to get back this fund into German hands and take it away as a trust fund for the payment of American claims. I do not think any more just or American act was ever performed by Congress than when we hit the junker class of Germany by taking their property away. All I want is to see an organized committee of the Senate that will look into the facts, make a primary investigation of the facts in this case, and then report those facts to the Senate, if we are to have an investigation of facts, under which we may determine whether or not the investigation should lie, and not merely proceed on the theory of somebody outside that some things have been done which need investigation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will make a single suggestion, and then I will yield the floor.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has stated that unless the treaty is ratified the Germans will have the right possibly to get at this fund. I am a little at a loss to understand how that is true, unless there have been invalid and illegal acts upon the part of the Alien Property Custodian. We had a perfect right to enact the alien-property-custodian law; we have a perfect right to do all that we did or that was authorized to be done under that act. If that which was done under the act was in accordance with the act, and if the act was administered according to law, there is nothing to validate, and the treaty could not add anything by its so-called validation. The treaty can only protect the situation and can only protect the Alien Property Custodian or protect the fund by validating something which has been invalid.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Idaho, if he investigates the question, will come to the directly opposite conclusion, and that he will conclude that the representatives of the United States were very wise when they incorporated in the treaty an agreement by Germany under which she validates the act of Congress and the action of the Alien Property Custodian. In the absence of fraud, those acts are absolutely valid. That stipulation was made for this reason: Germany had asserted before the peace commission a claim that the treaty of 1828 with Prussia was in force. That treaty revived certain provisions of the treaty of 1798; and those two treaties together were intended to operate in case of war between the United States and Germany. They provided that any national of Germany in the United States or any citizen of Germany having property in the United States should have that property protected in the event of war and should be permitted nine months, if he were a resident of the United States, in which to sell his property and leave the country, and that the property of her nationals was to be sacred from seizure.

Mr. BORAH. But, Mr. President, the act of Congress would repeal the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The treaty was intended to exist during war.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; but——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And Congress could not violate that treaty——

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes, it could; that is, could abrogate it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Without laying itself open to a claim by Germany which Germany could assert any time in the future. That claim is barred only by the provisions of the treaty.

Now, Mr. President, that was considered highly important at the time because it not only involved $750,000,000 which we have realized or are to realize from the sale of this property, but it made it possible to guarantee the payment out of this fund of certain claims which America must protect. There are claims amounting to $45,000,000 for damages which American citizens suffered while the United States was neutral; they are to be protected out of this fund. There is something in the neighborhood of $250,000,000 worth of American property in Germany which can not be safeguarded unless this fund is used for that purpose. There is also the indebtedness of German citizens to American citizens of an unknown amount, but which undoubtedly runs into a large figure. All of those claims are to be paid out of the proceeds of the liquidation of the property of German nationals in this country; and Germany assumes under the treaty to reimburse her nationals and guarantee that they shall have no claim against the United States for anything except in the case of fraud in the administration of the act. The Senator certainly does not think that the United States commissioners made a mistake in putting those clauses into the German treaty which thus validate the act of Congress, wipe out the old treaties of 1828 and 1798, and validate all of the acts of the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. BORAH. I do not say that they made a mistake necessarily. I say, however, that when we declared war against Germany, by reason of that act we had a perfect right to pass the alien property custodian act, and in so far as that act conflicted with the provisions of the treaty with Prussia and with Germany it abrogated those treaties.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the Senator will realize that those treaties——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will address the Chair. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator will realize that those treaties were treaties intended to operate in case of war. They were not treaties that were killed by a declaration of war; they were reciprocal treaties, and they specifically provided that for nine months after the United States went to war with Germany they should be in effect and German nationals should be permitted to save their property. We disregarded that. Why? Because we believed we were going to beat Germany and because we were going to get in the treaty of peace a validation of our act.

Mr. BORAH. We had a perfect right to disregard the provisions of the treaty; and Germany could derive no benefit whatever by reason of the fact that Congress saw fit to do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator question the fact that if it were not for those provisions of the treaty of peace Germany would have an enormous claim to be asserted against the United States?

Mr. BORAH. I do question it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Which would probably lead to animosity and possibly ultimately lead to war.

Mr. BORAH. Animosity does not cut any figure; we can not control that; but I challenge the proposition that Germany would have any claim whatever if the alien property custodian law was executed according to its terms. We had a perfect right to pass it; we had a perfect right to execute it, and if the Alien Property Custodian performed his duties under the law and in accordance with the law there was no necessity for a validation of his acts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator will understand that I am not here to argue that Germany is correct in her position.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; I see.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not here to argue that Germany was correct when she said the treaty of 1828 is still in force and that that perpetuates the treaty of 1798; but I say that the question is largely a legal question; it is a question of international law. When two countries make a treaty and agree that if they should go to war their nationals will be protected it is a question that may be asserted any time in the future unless it is wiped out by a treaty agreement, and it can not be wiped out in this instance unless the treaty is ratified.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There can be no doubt at all about the position taken by the Senator from Idaho that the alien property custodian act and the trading-with-the-enemy act are valid acts of Congress, the treaty of 1828 to the contrary notwithstanding; that is to say, that the courts of the United States will recognize the acts of Congress as, one might say, abrogating the treaty; but of course the Senator would not contend that in an international forum of any kind the United States would be considered as escaping from its obligations under the treaty of 1828 because it passed such an act as the trading-with-the-enemy act. The power of Congress to abrogate a treaty by act of Congress is simply local in its operation; it does not affect the validity of the treaty when it is brought under consideration in an international forum; otherwise a treaty would have no significance at all, because either party could repeal it at will without any responsibility whatever and without being answerable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word, so that my position will be plain. I am against the passage of the pending resolution. I think that Congress is making a very great mistake in trying to carry on investigations of this character. It is a waste of the people's money compared with what is accomplished. We would better spend our time as Senators in considering legislation instead of spending a lot of money and using our time trying to find something wrong with various administrative matters in connection with the prosecution of the war.

I doubt not that a great many mistakes have been made; I doubt not that there has been wrongdoing in many cases; there may have been collusion, and there may have been corruption; but no committee of Congress will ever find it out. If the committee would employ attorneys and accountants and prepare its case like a prosecuting attorney would prepare it, we might get somewhere, but my observation has been that these investigations have never convicted anybody of wrongdoing.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the resolution provides for the employment of counsel. I will further inquire of him, How does he expect to ascertain whether collusion or corruption exists in this department without some investigation of this character? There is no other way of finding out.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It may be true that the resolution provides for these things; but there are no Senators here who really have the time from their other duties to carry on an investigation of this kind as it ought to be carried on if it is to be made. We can not get quorums out to committee meetings now to consider important legislation that is urgent, and that ought to be passed promptly. Why? Not because Senators are neglecting their duties, but simply because they have so many committee meetings to attend and so many hearings with reference to legislation to attend that they can not attend all of them and some must be neglected.

I feel that the people of the country are not looking with very much patience upon the investigations that Congress is carrying on. They know that mistakes have been made in the conduct of the war. They know that there may have been waste and there may have been something criminal. It was natural, and was to be expected. They are expecting Congress, however, to look to the future, and to give its attention more to legislation to solve the problems that are confronting us, rather than giving its time to things that are past and that can not be remedied.

Mr. President, that is my view generally with reference to investigations by Congress at this time as to things in the past. Furthermore, I do not believe we ought to pass this resolution until it has been acted upon by a committee of the Senate that has jurisdiction over the subject matter. It will involve the expenditure of thousands and possibly hundreds of thousands of dollars. Attorneys and accountants are to be employed, as should be done if any such investigation is to be entered upon. Before entering upon such an investigation the Senate should have the recommendation of some committee that it believes, and has reason to believe from the showing made, that there ought to be an investigation, and that we are justified in spending this money for such purpose. I do not understand that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate looks into these things. It does not go into the merits of the question, and for that reason alone I shall vote to refer the matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, because that committee has partially gone into it.

This legislation, as the Senator from New York suggested a while ago, came from the Committee on Commerce, and I am inclined to think that that would be the proper place for a resolution of this sort to go; but I do not want it to go to that committee. It would not come out of the committee with my consent unless a strong prima facie need for an investigation is shown A motion has been made to refer it to the Judiciary Committee, and I shall vote for that motion if I have the opportunity.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, there is a good deal of force in what the Senator from Washington has just said. We were all surprised at the reports that were made in reference to the airplane program of the War Department. We had an investigation, and at the head of it was Justice Hughes; and what was the result of it? Can anyone point to any effective results from that investigation—and that was probably as thorough an investigation as any?

I am opposed to the reference of this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, but for a reason different from all others. The nomination of Attorney General Palmer came before the Judiciary Committee. It was referred to a subcommittee of five, of which the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] was the head. That committee gave careful hearings and attention to the subject, and came to the conclusion unanimously that there was nothing in reference to the conduct of Mr. Palmer that justified the rejection of his nomination. I do not believe that this investigation will result in any good. In nearly every case where there was a disposal of alien property Mr. Palmer had a board of appraisers appointed and accepted their judgment.

The most that can possibly be shown against Mr. Palmer is the fact that in the matter of employing attorneys and other agents he favored his own friends and members of his own party; and while, according to the highest ethical principles that may not be entirely justified, yet in these days of partisan politics, from which we can not, however much we would like to, entirely disarm ourselves, it is to be expected that in such matters a man is likely to favor his political friends.

Being convinced—and I am unwilling to take the time of the Senate further—first of all that nothing serious can be discovered in this investigation, and being of the opinion that aside from the mere favoring of political friends in the matter of attorneyship and fees, Mr. Palmer has been entirely innocent, and that no good can be accomplished by this investigation, I therefore shall be very glad not to have this resolution go to the Judiciary Committee; and if I acted according to my own judgment I should move that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Did I understand the Senator to say that, in his judgment, the Alien Property Custodian had used his office for political purposes?

Mr. NELSON. I understand that he has used it as a good many other good citizens do in the matter of appointments to places; they look to their own friends and party affiliations. I do not think even the Senator from New York himself, in his political career, can say that he has not favored his political friends instead of his political enemies.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The "Senator from New York" is not submitting himself to cross-examination; but the "Senator from New York" may remind the Senator from Minnesota that the office which Mr. Palmer held was that of a trustee for the people of the United States in time of war, which, to my mind, puts an entirely different color on this whole question; and I was interested to hear the Senator from Minnesota intimate, at least, that the Judiciary Committee had reached the conclusion that the Alien Property Custodian had used the office for politics in time of war.

Mr. NELSON. No; the committee did not reach that conclusion. That is my individual opinion.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I make that correction.

Mr. NELSON. The subcommittee never reached that conclusion, and I have not reached it. I have only said that, in my opinion, that is the utmost that can be proved against Mr. Palmer. It is not my opinion, even, that there is much in that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to renew what he has just said, that the committee reached no such conclusion in its findings; but, more than that, while of course Mr. Palmer appointed some Democrats and some Republicans, a majority of the members of the important boards on valuation were leading Republicans. He did not appoint them for that reason. More than that, some of the most important lawyers who had charge of this matter were Republicans. For instance, Mr. Bradley Palmer, who wrote the clauses in the treaty of peace, and represented the Alien Property Custodian in Paris, not only is a distinguished lawyer and a distinguished Republican of Boston, Mass., but I myself sat on the Judiciary Committee of the House with his father, representing a Pennsylvania district as a Republican. So I think if you will only investigate the matter you will find that outside of those who are holding minor offices—and I can not speak as to those, because I do not know—when it comes to the leading men in this organization, there were as many Republicans as there were Democrats.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Since the Senator has mentioned the name of Mr. Bradley Palmer, and he is a citizen of my State, there is no question of his standing at the bar or his standing as a man. It is the very highest; and to the best of my knowledge and belief—and I think it is good—he is a Republican.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. CALDER. I want to respond to what the Senator from Alabama has said about the committee having charge of the supervision of sales. He stated that the majority of that committee were Republicans. The other day in discussing this subject he referred to one of them, a citizen of New York, Judge Ingraham, as being a Republican. I would inform the Senator from Alabama that Judge Ingraham was elected repeatedly to judicial office by Tammany Hall. He is a lifelong Democrat, and was a member of Tammany Hall. I will further say, if the Senator will permit me, that while many Republicans served in places of importance in the Alien Property Custodian's office, the men who got the emoluments and profits out of this office were largely Democrats.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the Senator who got emoluments out of this? Most of the men that I know of that were employed by the Alien Property Custodian, outside of clerks, were working for a dollar a year, as a patriotic duty. Of course the clerks got their clerical pay, but I am talking about the leading men. I do not know who they were that got the emoluments in the employ of the Alien Property Custodian. If I recollect right, the Alien Property Custodian himself, a distinguished lawyer, now the Attorney General of the United States, a man of eminent ability, performed his services in handling a $750,000,000 trust fund at a salary of $5,000 a year. I do not see where there is any basis for a charge against him in that connection; and his was the highest salary paid.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. An investigation may demonstrate that large fees were not paid directly by the Alien Property Custodian; but it is charged that these excessive fees were paid in many cases out of the funds of enemy-owned corporations, with the knowledge and consent of the Alien Property Custodian, before these funds were turned over to him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I can deny that, and I do not want the record here to mislead. I will say to the Senator, as I know he does not know, but I do, that the Committee on Appropriations of the House called on Mr. Palmer for a statement as to what was paid in the way of fees in this matter. The largest fee that was paid was $25,000, in a very large case, with a volume 2 inches thick of what the lawyer, a New York lawyer, had to do. The next largest fee, as I recollect it, was $15,000. Those were the large fees paid, in very large matters. In the bulk of the thousands of cases in which lawyers were involved they worked for a dollar a year, or a nominal compensation, and if you should average the fees that were paid them they would not be as much as the pages on this floor are paid.

It is not a question for investigation by a committee of the Senate. You do not have to investigate it. If you go to the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, you can find it there; and there has been in the possession of that committee for months a complete report of every dollar that was paid. There was some little criticism of one fee of $25,000 until the enormous amount of work that was done in the matter was shown. That is not a question of investigation. It is a fact. If you do not want to go to the House, you can go to the Alien Property Custodian's office.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to pour a little oil on the troubled waters. If the Senate wants to investigate the compensation paid, there is a better gold mine in investigating the Railroad Administration, where $50,000, $75,000, and $100,000 a year are paid. If compensation is a question to be investigated, we had better turn to the Railroad Administration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator says that $50,000, $75,000, and $100,000 a year were paid. To whom were such payments made?

Mr. NELSON. To the men who run our railroads under the Government.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator mean the attorneys, or that the money was paid to somebody who held an office under the Government?

Mr. NELSON. Somebody to whom they gave the name of managers—big men, who were picked out, men whose bigness consists in the almighty dollar that you put into their pockets.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota will allow me, the figure actually paid was large enough, but I think the Senator is mistaken in stating the salaries to be beyond $50,000. There were several paid $50,000 a year, several paid $45,000, and so on down, as has appeared from a report made to Congress. That is enough. I was not excusing so large a figure, but I was sure the Senator would not carry it beyond that if he were advised he was mistaken.

Mr. NELSON. Perhaps I went a little too high. [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, what I wanted to say—and I wanted to say it to Senators in all seriousness—is that Mr. Palmer had a great task to perform, and he had to work through many instrumentalities. He had to take in the range of the entire country. I know from little matters that happened in my own State how some of the German interests took pains to cover up their tracks. I think he deserves, on the whole, great credit for his work in ferreting out German interests in this country and disposing of them and putting them into the hands of the Federal Government. There were instances in which he took over industries and changed them from being industries in the hands of Germans into American industries engaged in the work of production for the necessities of the war.

I am unwilling, Mr. President, to take up the time of the Senate more than to say it is my own opinion, from the investigation that took place before the Judiciary Committee, that no case can be made against Mr. Palmer, and there is no occasion for this investigation.

I regret to say, and, after all, I do not regret it, that I am unable to wrap myself up in a party political spirit in a matter of this kind. I look upon it from the standpoint of the ordinary American citizen. Mr. Palmer had a great task to perform; he performed it, in my opinion, as carefully and prudently as a man could under the circumstances. In all instances where he took possession of property and had to sell it he was careful, as he was in those cases that our committee investigated, to have a board of independent appraisers appraise the property, and he would act according to their judgment. What more could a man do?

Mr. President, I can see no good to be accomplished by this proposed investigation, and were it not for the fact that I do not want to hurt the feelings of my good friend from New York [Mr. CALDER], I should move to indefinitely postpone the resolution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I did not intend to speak upon this question, but inasmuch as my name has been mentioned in an article which has been inserted in the RECORD in reference to the resolution which I introduced at a previous session of Congress, I feel that I ought to explain my position upon it.

I objected to the nomination of Mr. Palmer, and presented certain statements and criticisms to a subcommittee, and asked that they be investigated. I made no charges. I simply thought that the subcommittee should investigate the statements and criticisms which had been made to me.

The committee unanimously approved the nomination of Mr. Palmer, and he was confirmed. Therefore the question of Mr. Palmer's fitness for office has nothing to do with this resolution. That is a closed question. The question before the Senate is whether Senators care to investigate the Alien Property Custodian's office, which was intrusted with the trusteeship of $700,000,000 worth of industrial property and private trusts during the war. The disposition of the funds under the custody of Mr. Palmer is left with Congress. Is it not a matter of interest to Congress, and have they not a right to know, and is it not our duty to find out how those funds have been administered?

An investigation by a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee has been spoken of. The subcommittee were not investigating the Alien Property Custodian's office. They were making an inquiry into the fitness of Mr. Palmer to be Attorney General. While I have no criticism to make against that subcommittee, there was no difference of opinion, except that I felt, and I still feel, that witnesses should have been called to prove or disprove the statements made before the subcommittee by Mr. Palmer and those who were criticizing him. However, the subcommittee felt, and I submitted to their judgment, that it was not necessary to subpœna witnesses, or that it did not come within their power and scope.

Great business interests have been seized in this country and have been sold, and American interests are involved, because in many of those industries there were American stockholders, and there are criticisms from American citizens against the administration of the Alien Property Custodian's office, and it is our duty to investigate and ascertain whether the American interests have been conserved. I am not interested in German interests; I care nothing for them; but I do care whether Mr. Palmer, in his trusteeship and administration of his office, in any way injured American interests.

There is further information that Congress ought to have, and that is on the question of the formation of the Chemical Foundation. Mr. Palmer took all the German patents in his hands and sold them to a corporation. That corporation which he formed was headed by Mr. Garvan, who is now the Alien Property Custodian. Directors were appointed consisting of the board of advisers and appraisers which Mr. Palmer had appointed in New York. No one knows what those patents are worth, but they are worth more than the $250,000 for which they were sold to this private corporation founded at Mr. Palmer's instance. It is true that these officers receive no emolument, but they have control of all these patents and have the licensing power. Before an industry in this country can use or procure from that foundation permission to use those patents it must go before that corporation and procure a license to use them.

I do not know whether that policy is a good one or not, but, as a Senator, I want to know why those powers are conferred on a private corporation and whether industries in my State are being discriminated against or not. Notwithstanding the arguments which have been made here to prove that this investigation is unnecessary, I say where a man has been intrusted with the custodianship of a billion dollars it is the duty of Congress to know how that trusteeship has been administered.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio desires to submit any remarks upon this question, I will yield to him.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I wish merely to make one suggestion. I am just as jealous of the record of this Government and of its officials as anyone can be. There has been a pretty full investigation of Mr. Palmer's official record, and now another investigation is asked for. It so happens that Mr. Palmer is now the Attorney General of the United States, and he is weighted down with the responsibilities of that great office. It is enough to tax his talents and take all his time to perform the duties there. If now he is to be called before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate or some other committee which may be investigating his official acts, it is going to take his time and attention away from his present official duties, in order that he may guard his own reputation against assaults which will be made upon him by German citizens, as well as others. I feel just this way about it: If the Judiciary Committee will come in here and say that in their judgment there ought to be an investigation, I will vote for it; but until the Judiciary Committee, or some other committee, says there should be an investigation, I shall not vote for it.

I simply wanted to make that perfectly clear. I think there is something due to Mr. Palmer in his present position.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have waited patiently to present some morning business. It is now too late to present it. I do not want to hold back any longer the chief business that should be before the Senate. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

POSTMASTER GENERAL AND CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. NORRIS. Like the Senator, I had some morning business to submit. I have a Senate resolution that I wanted to introduce and have go over under the rule. I should like to have it read, and give notice that to-morrow, as soon as the routine morning business is disposed of, I shall address the Senate on it, and ask the Senate to make some disposition of it. If the Senator would yield, I should like to introduce the resolution and have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Massachusetts withhold his motion?

Mr. LODGE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the resolution which I send to the desk be read, and I wish to give notice that to-morrow, or at least within the next few days, if I can get recognition after the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate on the subject of the resolution and ask the Senate to make some disposition of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 186) was read, as follows:

Whereas it is currently reported in the public press that the Postmaster General has been actively engaged in interfering with the work of the Civil Service Commission in relation to the examination and certification by said commission of eligibles from which postmasters are to be selected, and is attempting to control said examinations and certifications with a view of securing partisan political appointments to such places; and

Whereas it is also reported that in carrying out such plan, the President has demanded the resignation of certain members of the Civil Service Commission; and

Whereas one of said commissioners in resigning his place has issued a public statement in which the foregoing facts are, in substance, charged: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be, and they are hereby, instructed to investigate such charges and reports and report to the Senate, first, whether the Postmaster General has used the power of his office to control the action of the Civil Service Commission in such examinations and certifications, and, second, if the committee finds that the Postmaster General is guilty of such charges, then was such action on the part of the Postmaster General taken with the consent and the knowledge of the President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. I renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of the German treaty in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the treaty in open executive session.

Mr. WADSWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from New York will yield to me for a moment before he begins to speak, I ask to have read a news dispatch from the Washington Star of yesterday evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Washington (Evening) Star of Sept. 18, 1919.]

"MINERS VOTE DOWN LEAGUE APPROVAL—WHOLE SUBJECT TABLED AT CONVENTION—THEATRICAL WAVING OF BRITISH FLAG.

"CLEVELAND, OHIO, September 18.

"The convention of the United Mine Workers of America to-day voted down a resolution indorsing the league of nations and calling upon the Senate to ratify it without amendment and without further delay. The convention by a large majority then voted to table the entire subject, including motions against the adoption of the league of nations as now constituted.

"The debate showed a wide range of opinion for and against, indicating that the miners were sharply divided on this question. The motion to table the subject was carried largely on the argument that the peace treaty had now become a political issue on which a labor convention should not be called upon to take action.

"RESOLUTION AROUSES.

"The resolution precipitating the discussion, which was drafted by Secretary-treasurer William Green, of the international organization, and recommended for adoption by the committee on resolutions, declared for immediate ratification without amendment, in order to bring about the speedy establishment of normal conditions.

"It described the league covenant as purposing the settlement of disputes between nations by conciliation and arbitration rather than by force of arms and the ultimate disarmament of the nations of the world and as the first step forward in the direction of universal peace.

"Its advocates, all of whom admitted defects and weaknesses in the covenant and treaty as drafted, defended it on these grounds. Opposition speakers raised against it arguments based upon the larger voting power of Great Britain in the league, failing to provide independence and self-determination for Ireland and India, and the Shantung settlement. Critics of the 'imperialistic policy of the British Empire' and of the 'recognition and perpetuation of the autocratic power of the crowned heads of Europe' were numerous and were vigorously applauded.

"WAVES FLAG THEATRICALLY.

"Delegate Greathouse, of Flemington, W. Va., brought about a theatrical moment by mounting the stage with the British and American flags in his hands and crying out that though he favored a league of nations he would never vote to put the Union Jack above the Stars and Stripes by giving the British Empire seven votes to one for the United States in the league.

"Robert Harlin, president of the Washington State miners' organization, who recently returned from consultations with English labor leaders, argued that Great Britain was on the eve of the inauguration of a labor government, from whose hands Ireland and India had nothing to fear, and that seats in the league for Canada, Australia, and New Zealand meant not extra votes for an imperialist policy of the British Empire, but votes for really independent, democratic States, whose ideals were in thorough harmony with those of the United States.

"Duncan MacDonald, secretary of the Illinois Federation of Labor, hoped that the convention would not give support to a proposition which had now become political and for which, he declared, a fund of $100,000 was now being raised among 'Wall Street millionaires,' and opposed the league in its present form as one not composed of representative men and women of the nations of the world, but an alliance dominated by monarchial governments of the Old World.

"The United States had but a single vote in its councils, and under such a condition, he asked, what chance had the United States of securing the adoption of measures in which it was interested against the votes of these powers, when a unanimous vote on practically all questions was provided for. His view that the league covenant and the treaty of peace required amendment before acceptance by the United States was supported by other speakers during the debate, which occupied almost the entire morning session.

"A resolution to transfer the international headquarters of the United Mine Workers of America from Indianapolis to Cleveland was voted down."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is of such tremendous importance that one is staggered at confronting it. As we shall decide it, so shall the destinies of generations of Americans yet unborn be guided and controlled. When one attempts to analyze and comprehend the ramifications and possibilities of the proposal laid before the Senate, one feels small and at a loss as to how to proceed.

The proposal is bigger than any man. It is bigger than any party. It is not, however, bigger than the Government of the United States, for the Government of the United States is the representative and agent of the people of the United States, and unless our institutions have already proved a failure anything that is bigger than the Government is bigger than the people. To that doctrine as enunciated by the President in a recent speech I can not subscribe. Nor can I pursue a discussion of this topic in what has become the conventional way. To my mind there is no room for epithets or invectives. I do not intend to condemn any man or group of men for thinking differently than I do, but merely to assume the right, as a Senator of the United States, to express my convictions and to do my best to perform the duties which the Constitution of this great Republic imposes upon me as a Senator.

As the discussion has proceeded thus far, it would seem to me that a good many of the proponents of the covenant of the league of nations, as now presented, have forgotten that this American people is not as other peoples are. Its proponents seem to overlook some exceedingly important differences existing between the American people in their composition and all other peoples of the earth. I would not insist, Mr. President, that the ideals of the American people are better than the ideals of any other people. It would be unseemly thus to boast. Nor would I boast that the intelligence of the American people is higher than the intelligence of any other people. It is not necessary to conduct a discussion upon that plane.

But I do insist that the ideals and methods of thought of the American people are different from the ideals and the methods of thought of every other people, and they are different because of the peculiar composition of this people and its position geographically.

When we won our independence as a result of the War of the Revolution our people were made up largely of immigrants or the descendants of immigrants who came from England, Scotland, Ireland, Holland, Germany, and France—from France especially the group known as the French Huguenots. They were a composite people even at that early day. The first group who came to this country came here seeking religious liberty, if I recollect history correctly, and they were followed as time went on by other and larger groups seeking political liberty; and they in turn were followed by other and still larger groups, as the years went by, seeking economic opportunity. But our make-up, even 130 years ago, was the result of immigration from five or six countries, and the population over which the Government of the United States was established in 1789, and of which Washington was President, contained several different nationalities and peoples of different racial origin. Since that time we have received upon our shores an ever-increasing number of people coming from Europe, and even from parts of Asia. To the English, the Scotch, the Irish, the Dutch, the Germans, and the French, who in a large measure composed the Revolutionary population, we have had added to our numbers vast aggregations of Hungarians, Austrians, Poles, Russians, Greeks, Syrians, Armenians, Roumanians, Bulgarians, Portuguese, Serbians, and people from other nations that I shall not take the time to endeavor to recollect. The wonder of it all has been that for 130 years these groups of people of widely different racial origin and widely different nationality, with all the prejudices which go with nationality, have been able to live side by side in the United States in peace and happiness. Very few statesmen of the Old World have understood how we have done it; and, as a matter of fact, Senators will recollect, I have no doubt, that prior to our entrance into the German war and for the first few months after our entrance into that conflict the alleged savants and scholars of Germany predicted the complete breakdown of this country because, not understanding our institutions and our peculiar national psychology, they figured that the people of the United States were not and could not be a united people owing to this variety in their origin. Few people abroad comprehend what this means, and I fear, Mr. President, that a great many people in the United States are to-day forgetting what it means. It is this phase of the subject which I wish to emphasize for a few moments before the Senate, because I regard it as vital. If we do not understand it, if we do not comprehend the meaning of our institutions and the secret of our success here, great composite people as we are, we are apt to endanger the future happiness of this Nation which has been hailed by other peoples as the hope of the world.

I can not pose as a student of history to the extent which would justify me in attempting to read the thoughts of George Washington, but I do think I know enough about the history of this country and his utterances and the atmosphere in which he lived to warrant the belief that Washington looked toward the future when he made his Farewell Address and saw coming to the shores of America all these different groups, and that the thing which concerned him most of all, and which concerned his contemporaries, Jefferson among them, was the prospect that these great groups of people coming to the United States would find themselves unable to weld themselves together into one American people. He knew they could not be welded together in one great American people unless they exercised unceasing vigilance against the injection of European politics into American domestic politics. The country from his day to this day has managed to assimilate this tremendous tide of immigration, because as fast as these people have reached our shores and have started in to earn their living and to pursue their happiness, they have found an atmosphere removed completely and entirely from the intrigues and the turmoils of the countries from which they came. The result has been that the Greeks and the Bulgarians have lived here side by side in peace; the Englishman and the Irishman have lived here side by side in peace, as have the German and the Frenchman, the Austrian and the Hungarian, the Pole and the Russian, not forgetting the affection which they naturally owe to their mother countries, but conscious of the fact that they have reached a country where they are free from those prejudices, intrigues, and turmoils, and where men, no matter what their national or racial origin, could start out free and endowed with the opportunity of working out their own salvation as American citizens and American citizens first. So they have forgotten the politics, the intrigues, and the frictions of the Old World; and by reason of their being able to forget them this American people is a united people to-day. I think Washington saw that; I think Washington hoped and prayed that we would maintain that atmosphere here in the United States and would keep our politics free from European issues.

Some may not consider this an important side of the discussion now going on, but with those who are disposed to pass it by casually I can not agree. Already we see the effects in this country of the proposals contained in the covenant of the league and the treaty; already we see the effects of the partial participation in which this Government of ours has indulged in European frictions and disputes. Some examples of it have come to my personal attention, and it was these incidents which opened my eyes for the first time to the importance of the situation.

Senators will remember that the President of the United States, while he was in Paris, issued a public statement to the Italian people, for, as I recollect, his statement was addressed to them, and in a sense was addressed to them over the heads of the Italian Government, in which he declared it as his opinion—and necessarily his opinion was deemed to represent the opinion of the Government of the United States, he being the head of the Government—that the city of Fiume should be awarded to Jugo-Slavia and not to Italy. Within eight days of the publication of the President's statement in Paris on that question my mail was filled with letters and petitions and circulars from Italian-born citizens of the United States urging me, as a Member of the Senate, to use what influence I had—and, of course, it was next to nothing, although they did not know that, apparently—as a Member of the Congress to see that the Government of the United States took sides with Italy as against Jugo-Slavia. In other words, European politics appeared in American politics. It was entirely natural that these Italian-born American citizens should have addressed me in that way; it was the most natural thing in the world; but it was the first clear sign coming to my attention of what this internationalism may mean in America. They addressed me and probably addressed other Senators. They saw our Government taking part in the settlement of the frictions and disputes of Europe. They were American citizens, and very naturally they exercised the right of petition to Congress or to Members of Congress to influence our Government in settling the dispute in favor of the mother country—in this case Italy.

I have heard from delegations of Lithuanians, who, in the same way, seeing the Government of the United States about to cast a deciding vote, perhaps, as to whether there shall be a Lithuania independent of Russia or independent of Poland; they have written me, as they have doubtless written other Senators, using their political influence—and in an entirely legitimate way, mind you—in the body politic of America to have the Government of the United States settle a dispute in Europe in a certain way. I could relate many instances of the same kind, Mr. President.

I do not decry the spirit of the citizens who have written me or who have petitioned me in that way. I can well understand it. They are entirely human in trying so to influence the Government of the United States; but as I contemplate the possibilities of the future, when, as I understand, the Government of the United States must take part, directly or indirectly, in the settlement of every dispute on earth—when I contemplate the possibilities of such a situation I wonder whether we can remain a united people upon this continent; I wonder whether it will not result in breaking us apart into groups of people, each gathered together in accordance with its national or racial origin, each intent upon using its political influence upon the Government at Washington in order that their ideas may be carried out in far-away Europe or far-away Asia.

We have had a tremendous task in this country in assimilating these people; and they are a splendid people who have come here. We have been fortunate, Mr. President, on account of our geographical position; fortunate, too, because we have avoided, up to this hour at least, permanent alliances which would inject us into the politics of Europe; and our very avoidance of the pitfalls which must necessarily exist in European and Asiatic politics accounts for our being an American people to-day with an allegiance to America first.

The Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate have seen something of this same tendency. Delegations have come before the committee and urged the claims of far-away countries. I do not criticize the committee for a moment for permitting them to come. That is what we have got to do from now on if we take this covenant and this treaty as proposed. This is to be but the beginning, Mr. President. The Congresses of the future will find it absolutely impossible to close the doors against groups who seek to come before the committees and exercise their influence, not as American citizens first, but as American citizens anxious to control something in the politics of Europe. When you shall have that situation in the United States you will have poisoned the political life of this people.

Mr. President, as I recollect, from having read the treaty as carefully as I can, we are about to set up several new nations. This was inevitable, coming out of this great war, and I make no complaint against it; but I think it well for Senators to stop and think a moment and analyze, if we can, some of the possibilities of this situation. It was best expressed by Mr. Lloyd-George in a statement which he made to the House of Commons several months ago. He used this expression, as I recollect it: "We are Balkanizing central Europe"—in other words, that central Europe was being cut up into several comparatively small nations, and that the map of central Europe will take on somewhat the appearance of the old-time map of the Balkans.

Out of this war is emerging Poland, a restored and independent Poland, and we all rejoice at it; a restored and independent Bohemia, or Czechoslovakia, and we all rejoice at it; a separate Hungary; a separate Austria; a new Jugo-Slav State; a readjusted Greece; a readjusted Bulgaria; a readjusted Roumania. These readjustments, it is apparent, are not going on with that degree of smoothness for which we have hoped.

The Poles are now fighting, as I understand, upon three fronts. The Roumanians only the other day invaded Hungary and seized the capital of that country; and it may be of interest to note that they paid no attention whatsoever to the mandate of the allied council at Paris instructing them to retire from Budapest. This is an indication in part, at least, of the respect for international authority held by the Roumanians. The Serbians and the Greeks, in certain portions of territory lower down in the Balkans, are standing armed to the teeth, watching each other. The Jugo-Slavs and the Italians have already had open outbreaks in and about Fiume; and we find cause for thought in the dispatches which come to us during the last two or three days, describing how the poet D'Annunzio has seized the town of Fiume with a group of Italian soldiers who apparently have deserted their lawful commanders, and is defying even the Italian Government, holding Fiume against the world for Italy. The dispatches indicate even that the British and French military forces—of course, very small in number—have been compelled to leave Fiume, and that the allied council has turned over to Italy the job of straightening out that tangle—the first indication that this international organization has not entire confidence in its ability to settle the dispute aroused by the poet.

Mr. President, the frictions and the jealousies that exist between these groups of people and between these nations that I have enumerated are centuries old. In many of them they are inborn, inbred. We Americans may be impatient at the evidences of them, but we might just as well make up our minds that those prejudices and animosities are there; and for one I do not believe that the people of the United States can ever come to understand them. We have no method of reaching an understanding of that condition which has existed for so many centuries; and when we attempt to take the lion's share of the responsibility in drawing every boundary line which shall separate those nations, and in settling every dispute which may arise between them for all time to come—I would not object so much if it were only for a year or two, but for all time to come—when we consent to take the lion's share of that responsibility, it is wise for us to understand what we are doing.

That brings one inevitably to a discussion of article 10.

There have been a good many explanations of that article. There have been a great many efforts to assure people that it does not mean what it says; and I do not suppose that there has ever occurred, in a discussion of two sentences, so much quibbling and squirming and ducking as in connection with the two sentences of article 10. To my mind the President has settled it, and settled it right, as to its meaning. He said it constitutes a binding moral obligation. All the play in and around the meaning of the word "advise" amounts to nothing. The important thing is the first part of the first sentence, which reads:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve.

"Undertake to respect and preserve!" the territorial integrity, and so forth.

And the important word in the second sentence is the word "obligation." Taking the two together, we are under an obligation, if we sign that contract, to respect and preserve the boundaries of all the members of the league.

I can not conceive that there is any other way by which we can approach the interpretation of that article. I do not believe the United States can afford to indulge in any mental reservations on this question. I do not believe we can afford to go into a contract of this sort, and subscribe to it just as it is written, unless we are fully determined to live up to it in spirit as well as in letter. The article describes this undertaking as an obligation; and if we are honest men, and if we are an honest Nation, we must carry out our obligation. It will not do to say that in the event of the executive council advising us to contribute so many troops or so many dollars for the suppression of a conflict somewhere upon the earth, we are left at liberty to decide whether we will contribute those troops or those dollars, for the instant you revise downward the suggestion of the executive council you are deserting the obligation; and if it shall be conceded that under such an obligation we have the moral right to revise those estimates downward, then every other nation will claim the same right, and article 10 will mean nothing. There will be no contribution worthy of the name toward the preservation of the political independence and territorial integrity of the State that is attacked.

No, Senators; we must live up to this thing in the spirit in which it is written, conscious of the fact that when we sign it we are imposing upon the people of America, for all time to come, a sacred obligation.

How about the habit of mind of the men who drew article 10? Unlike some prominent people in this country, I can not consent to ignore all the lessons of history. History teaches us a great deal more than visions teach us, and history is full of lessons concerning human nature; and human nature has not changed visibly in the last five years, nor do I believe it will change in a great many, many years to come in any fundamental way. The human race is a restless race. Its very restlessness accounts for its progress in large degree. An ideal captures the imagination of a group of people living somewhere upon the earth. It may be a religious ideal, it may be a political ideal, it may be some form of philosophy; but, whatever it is, it captures the imagination of a group of people somewhere, who, inspired with that ideal—and incidentally not all of them are accurate and correct and good—but inspired with that ideal, good or bad, those people go out to gain converts or to put their ideals or their philosophies into practice. History is replete with instances of how those movements, starting from some tiny seed, grow and grow and grow until they become great factors in the lives of a multitude of people. Sometimes they result in a revolution or rebellion, sometimes in civil war, sometimes in what might be termed "wars of aggression"; sometimes they finally result in great migrations of people which sweep across the face of the earth, trampling over political boundaries, tearing down systems of government, upsetting thrones, and changing the political map of the world.

History should teach us that the mandates or decrees of kings or emperors or of congresses or of parliaments are utterly futile and helpless in preventing this restless human race indulging in these activities, indulging in these efforts to improve its life, indulging in these efforts to climb upon a higher plane of civilization, indulging in these efforts to find the true God. And any group of men in the year 1919 who think they can establish a status quo, and mark out a system of boundaries which shall not be disturbed without their consent, and which shall preserve the existing political system subject to their revision, are afflicted with the height of human folly. They are flying in the face of all human experience, and are assuming to themselves a wisdom and an infallibility that no group of human beings has ever possessed.

Mr. President, classical legends tell us about Ajax, who defied the lightning. The men who drew article 10 outrival Ajax.

I hope most sincerely, sir, that that reservation which has been suggested and recommended by the Foreign Relations Committee—reservation No. 2—which has already been printed in the RECORD, and which I shall not read, will be adopted by the Senate, for if it is not adopted and we sign this contract with article 10 in it as now proposed, the people of the United States for all time to come—for this document can not be amended nearly as easily as has been suggested, it taking the unanimous consent of the executive council to amend this covenant—will be under obligations, when the call comes, to send their soldiers and their money in a fruitless endeavor to maintain for an indefinite period the statu quo of 1919; and when we stop to think and comprehend what that means I do not see how we can escape the conclusion that the Americans of the future are in for a forlorn hope. No organization, national or international, can put such a strait-jacket upon mankind. It may be that many good people wish that a strait-jacket could be placed on mankind. The important thing to remember is that it can not be done, whether it were wise to do it or not; and I doubt the wisdom of it. It can not be done, and I do not want to see my country and her soldiers devoted to any such purpose; for I believe that it would bring upon us the hatreds and the jealousies of peoples whom we can not understand and whose troubles and problems we have no means of learning about, and at the same time would place upon our shoulders a burden of obligation which the American people never expected would be placed upon their shoulders when they declared war against Germany.

Reverting for a moment more, Mr. President, to the peculiar composition of the American people and the effect which some of the provisions of this covenant and treaty may have upon our internal concerns, I invite attention to the language of article 16:

> Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, and 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not.

Mr. President, there are several possibilities in this situation which I think it wise for us to take under consideration.

It is not at all certain, it seems to me, that Greece and Bulgaria will be able to live side by side at peace for any great length of time. It is entirely possible, at least, that some day, smarting under some grievance or alleged grievance, Greece might attack Bulgaria. The instant she does so she has committed an act of war against every member of the league, including the United States, and under article 16 the nationals of the United States are forbidden to have any financial or personal intercourse with any national of Greece.

If we were a normal country, in the make-up of our population, that might not excite any discussion. But, as I said before, we are not normal in the make-up of our population. We have several hundred thousand Greek citizens in the United States. The men who wrote that article apparently forgot this situation, for I can not believe they would knowingly have attempted to impose it upon us. We have several hundred thousand Greek citizens residing in the United States, not as yet naturalized. If their mother country, Greece, goes to war against Bulgaria, no American citizen can buy anything of a Greek in the United States. He can have no financial intercourse with him. Every little store kept by a Greek in this country must be closed. No matter what his business, great or small, it must cease, for the United States has promised the world that none of her citizens shall do any business with a Greek under those circumstances. What is to become of them? Are they to be deprived of their means of livelihood? Presumably they must all be interned somewhere and fed and clothed.

I do not want to conjure up things that may seem of little importance, but when we are reading this document through, and reading it carefully, and trying to apply it to the peculiar conditions of America, let us remember what America is.

If Austria should attack Hungary some day, every Austrian in the United States would be ostracized immediately; or perhaps every Hungarian would be ostracized under article 16.

Mr. President, what would we do here? Will any man contend that the people of the United States, when once confronted with a practical situation of that sort, would tolerate it? I venture to say that the Federal Government that attempted by appropriate legislation to enforce the provisions of article 16 in a situation of that sort would find the gravest difficulty in enforcing the law.

I do not believe that you could get the American people, even under such a contract as this, with all the prestige of an international supergovernment back of it, to refuse to trade with the Greek delicatessen store next door; to refuse to have their shoes shined occasionally by the national of some country that has, it is alleged, broken this covenant.

One might go on and multiply the possibilities. It will not do to brush it aside casually and say, "That will never happen." Five or six years ago, Mr. President, we did not think we would ever be in a great war with a European power; but it happened. Even in December, 1914, when the war was something like four months old, only a few people suspected that we would ever be in it, and they were told that they were nervously excited. It is well, Senators, to get a little nervously excited sometimes when one views the possibilities of the future and to prepare ourselves against them; and when we view the possibilities of friction and ill feeling inherent in article 16 in its effect upon the people of the United States in their home life, in their home industries, in their home towns, I think we would better go a little slowly and make up our minds whether we want to sign a contract of that sort.

That argument could not apply to a country like France, where all the people are Frenchmen; it could not apply to the British Isles, where all the people are British; it could not apply to Germany, where all the people are German. But this country for many, many years to come will contain within its borders literally hundreds of thousands of foreigners who will live among us, whom we hope to educate to the best type of American citizenship; and I hope we will be permitted to continue in the greatest task of its kind the world has ever known, the Americanization of this great people.

Mr. President, reverting again to article 10, let me say that I have no love for war. War is organized destruction. It deluges the world with grief; modern war results in the death of millions of people, not only soldiers, but women and children, and it would be a blessing for the world if some substantial thing could be achieved toward making war impossible, or at least highly improbable.

But the thoughtful man can not deny, Mr. President, that occasions arise in the histories of peoples where war is the only means by which a people can secure freedom, can rid itself of oppression.

The American people did that in 1776. I do not think that anyone will contend that that was a wicked war. France came to our assistance. In coming to our assistance she attacked the territorial integrity of the British Empire, and had article 10 been in existence in 1776, or the year in which France came to our assistance, all the nations of Europe would have combined against France and the colonists and there would have been no free America.

Twenty years is but a moment of time in the history of a race, or the history, for that matter, of a nation. Let us look back 20 years, or 21 years to be exact, to the year 1898. People of the United States for many years had seen a condition of affairs in Cuba which pulled and stretched at their heartstrings. I do not have to describe them. It is not at all necessary. Suffice it to say that when, in that year, the situation in the neighboring island became such as to convince the American people that something had to be done, that convinced them that the situation was intolerable, that it must be stopped, the United States went to war against Spain to free the Cuban people, 2,500,000 of them. Some people may think that that was a wicked thing to do. I do not. In doing so we attacked the territorial integrity of Spain, and had article 10 been in existence in the year 1898 forty-odd nations would have combined themselves against the United States. One has but to state it to understand the possibilities, to realize, of course, that Cuba would not have been free.

Mr. President, this is the supercovenant of this league. It has been so described in the Senate by many of its proponents. It is the article of the covenant under which, no man can tell when, no man can tell where, it is possible for the United States, with all of her resources and all her ideals, to be employed in the suppression of the aspirations of some people struggling for liberty. I do not like even the possibility of such a thing. Some may say, "Oh, that is remote; that will not happen." How do we know it will not happen? Can we search the future with such unerring accuracy as to tell whether or not some struggling nation may, in an effort to free itself, be compelled to attack another nation? I think in the debates that have already taken place upon the floor something has been said about the future of Korea and the future of Shantung. One need not indulge in prophecies about those two unfortunate Provinces. One need only measure the possibilities of that Far Eastern situation and remember that it is entirely possible for one of the great Far Eastern powers to attack another of the great Far Eastern powers in an endeavor to bring freedom to Korea or Shantung, and in the event of such a happening under article 10 the United States must come to the support of the power that is attacked.

Mr. President, there have been several other phases of the discussion that have been enlarged upon by Senators who have preceded me in a far more able manner than I can discuss them, and yet I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I mention the Monroe doctrine. Information has come to us very recently that in the original manuscript of the proposed league of nations no mention was made whatsoever of the Monroe doctrine. Apparently it was not considered as of sufficient importance to warrant specific preservation. In the first draft of the covenant of the league of nations which we had presented for our consideration, unofficially it is true, no mention was made of it except that it was contended that article 10 extended the Monroe doctrine all over the world. That contention has been abandoned by the proponents of the covenant, and now an effort is made to include the proviso known as article 21, which shall have the effect of preserving the Monroe doctrine. It reads:

> Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

I do not suppose there is any Member of this body who will contend the Monroe doctrine is a regional understanding. I have not yet heard it so contended. Whoever drafted this article, whatever group of men drafted this definition of the Monroe doctrine, either did not know what the Monroe doctrine was or cared nothing for it. It is not a regional understanding, and everybody knows it is not. The term "understanding" implies something that has been assented to or agreed to by two or more people or nations. No two nations have ever agreed upon the Monroe doctrine. The United States has never asked any other nation to agree upon it or to reach any understanding concerning it. It was not proclaimed primarily for the purpose of securing the maintenance of peace. It was proclaimed primarily for the protection of the people of the United States. It is the declaration of the people of the United States, and it is not a declaration from any other people. In the language of the day, it may be described as a "keep off the grass" sign. It is put forth by the United States and by no other country. Its primary purpose was to guard the future development of the people of the United States, to maintain a state of affairs under which they would be free from any threat of European powers who might gain a lodgment upon the Western Hemisphere. Its incidental effect has been, to a considerable degree, the maintenance of peace, for it has kept the European nations politically and militarily outside of the Western Hemisphere.

I rejoice that the Committee on Foreign Relations proposes an amendment or a reservation which preserves that doctrine explicitly, for that doctrine is the principal bulwark protecting the safety and the independence of the people of the United States. I shall never consent with my vote to have the meaning of that doctrine passed upon by a foreign body. I shall never consent to have it interpreted, as was suggested by some of the British members of the peace commission, by the league of nations. It has been a cause of wonder to me that during all this discussion the attempt has been made to get the American people to believe that the Monroe doctrine means nothing to them any more and that it is entirely safe to permit a foreign body to interpret it. I hope the Senate will stand by the Committee on Foreign Relations in preserving the traditional policy of the United States, the Monroe doctrine, behind which we have lived free and secure since 1823.

Mr. President, I have referred to this covenant in part as a supercovenant and as establishing a supergovernment. I have expressed my hope that something might be done to make war impossible or improbable, and that leads me to discuss another phase of this subject which I think is fundamental.

This document, as I read it, attempts to set up a government of men. This supergovernment is to be headed by an executive council of nine, and there is to be an assembly composed of delegations from all of the members of the league, each country to be entitled to three delegates. I regret that the problem was approached in any such way. I had hoped, as many other people had hoped, that rather than to attempt to erect a government of men an attempt would be made to create a government of law. To my mind, it is highly regrettable that the best of the world's minds could not have been summoned to Paris or to some other appropriate capital and have been charged with the task of writing a code of international law. For many, many years, Mr. President, the most intelligent and eminent statesmen of the world have hoped and prayed that international law might finally be written in such a form as to claim the adherence and the allegiance of the civilized nations of the earth. The last great attempt in that direction, if I understand the situation, occurred in 1907, when, at The Hague convention, several new provisions of what it was hoped would become and remain international law were adopted. Others were suggested, but they failed of approval. I have been tempted to believe ever since that those other suggestions failed of approval because Germany, one of the members of that convention, had something up her sleeve for 1914 and did not want any more international law. However, that was the last attempt, Mr. President.

It is a pity, sir, that the nations of the earth, through their best legal minds, have not had an opportunity thus far since the day of the armistice of consulting together and writing a code of international law, a code which would describe and fix, if such a thing is possible, the rights of nations, which would give definition to international crimes; which would set up a code under which every nation could and would know just what it was entitled to do and just what it was not entitled to do; a code under which all nations would agree as to what should constitute a crime amongst nations. If we could once secure the adoption of such a code of international law, which all could understand, which all could agree upon, we would do more toward securing the peace of the world than by the creation of an executive council of nine human beings. For, mind you, Mr. President, the nine men who are to sit upon the executive council are not going to be archangels; they are going to be human beings first, last, and all the time, subject to the prejudices and the frictions and the jealousies and the influences to which all human beings, especially those in public life, are subject. The pity is that those men are not to be guided by any principle of law laid down and accepted by the civilized nations.

My principal protest, Mr. President, against the spirit underlying this document is that it constitutes an attempt to impose a system of international government downward upon the peoples of the earth; that it does not constitute an attempt to start at the bottom and build up upon sure foundations of accepted principles a system of laws which all civilized nations can understand and to which all civilized nations could give their adherence. That day, Mr. President, will come. We are getting off with a bad start toward that goal with this covenant and with this treaty; but the day will surely come when the common sense of the peoples of the world will demand that, instead of starting at the top, statesmen of the world start at the bottom and build something that will endure. When they have built a system of that sort we shall have something to which all nations may cling and cling properly.

Mr. President, pending the time when international law shall be agreed upon and proclaimed—and I believe that accomplishment is possible and more than possible—what is the highest duty of America? Can we be of more benefit to mankind by signing a contract some of the provisions of which I have attempted to describe? Can we do more toward lifting up the downtrodden and spreading the reign of liberty over the face of the earth as a member of a combination such as is here suggested?

To my mind, sir, the most precious possession of the American people during the 132 years of their existence has been their freedom of choice as between right and wrong in international affairs; freedom to choose, freedom to decide what their duty is in this event, in that event, in the other event; freedom to judge and to analyze conditions as they arise according to their peculiar political genius, according to their peculiar ideals and habits of thought. During all the years we have maintained that freedom. It is now proposed that we surrender it and no longer exercise that freedom of choice. It is proposed that we surrender it to the extent of following the advice of a body made up eight-ninths of men who can not understand American institutions and American ideals.

It has been argued that we are to have one member in that board of nine and that he can protect us; but has the time come, Mr. President, when the people of the United States are ready to rely upon the judgment of one man, sitting at the capital of Switzerland, who, by his vote, may pledge the support of the people of the United States to an undertaking with which they are utterly unfamiliar? Has the time come when we are to transfer that freedom of choice from the people and their Representatives in the Congress and repose it in the one American delegate in the executive council?

It was stated here upon the floor of the Senate the other day that that delegate would be under the control of the Congress. How would he be under the control of the Congress? Necessarily, he will have to be appointed by the President, and he will be 4,000 miles away from the Congress, sitting with his colleagues as a member of this supergovernment and charged with the responsibility of voting "yes" or "no" to the proposals that come before that body. I do not believe that his presence there would constitute a protection to the people of the United States.

The time has not come, sir, when we can be of the best service to the world by delegating the great power of this people in that manner. I believe, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] expressed it the other day, that America is the best hope of mankind. I believe she is mankind's best hope through the lofty example she sets, an example that has drawn to her shores millions and millions of people seeking refuge, an example that has inspired other nations to try to attain the same political ideals and the same political institutions. Many a constitution, Mr. President, in greater or less degree has been modeled after the Constitution of the United States.

And so I say, it is the duty of the people of the United States to maintain their freedom of choice. We have heretofore exercised it in international affairs; we exercised it in 1898; we exercised it on April 6, 1917, when we chose to go to war against the German Empire. We did not have to go; we had not signed any contract to obey anybody or to follow anybody's advice; we could have stayed out had we so desired; but we chose to go and we did go, because we were free to go and free to choose; and so long, Mr. President, as the people of the United States are free to choose they will lead the peoples of the earth toward a higher and better life. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I propose briefly to discuss the Russian situation, and then briefly to point out the fact that the treaties entered into at the close of the Napoleonic wars and what transpired then have no bearing upon the present situation in connection with the pending treaty. I propose, further, to show how utterly unjust is the second reservation in the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations. First, I wish to say a few words about Russia.

Owing to the collapse of the Czar's government and of the so-called Kerensky government, Russia was unable to render the Allies and our country any substantial assistance after the United States declared war; yet she had been of wonderful help to the Allies and their cause in weakening and diminishing the fighting strength of both Germany and Austria before that time. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], in the speech which he recently made, described the wonderful war record of Russia in the following terms, which I beg leave to quote:

> But there is one power we miss in all this, the power which met the brunt of the German shock while the rest of the world got ready; the power that mobilized in the allied cause some 21,000,000 men; that lost—killed in action—2,500,000; that lost in other casualties 3,500,000, of whom 1,500,000 are absolute invalids and badly mutilated; that lost in prisoners 2,000,000, of whom half died in prison; a power whose armies at the beginning of February in 1917 numbered 14,000,000 men under arms; who fought during the war over a front of 3,500 miles, and who had there pitted against her one-third of the whole German Army, two-thirds of the whole Austrian Army, all of the Hungarian Army, and two-thirds of the whole Turkish Army; a power who took as prisoners of war 400,000 Germans, 300,000 Hungarians, 300,000 Turks, and 1,000,000 Austrians. I speak of poor, ever despot-ridden Russia. I have but said China enjoyed a unique position; but I spoke in haste. Russia, who raised three times as many men as we planned to raise as a maximum; Russia, whose losses if imposed on us would have made every home in this land a house of mourning; Russia, whose men in battle front, unarmed and unequipped, stopped the German onrush of cold steel with bare breasts and clenched fists, so saving us and Europe from slavery; Russia, whose people and rulers stood forefront, our friends, even in the hours of our sore and most threatening distress; this Russia, with this record, is mentioned in this treaty, but only with ominous words that presage her national destruction.

After the Bolshevik or Soviet government, by the help of German intrigues, German money, German officers, and German ordnance and ammunition, under the lead of Lenin and Trotski, had been inaugurated, Russia ceased to be a factor in the war. In fact, by the abandonment of the cause of the Allies, by the demoralization of her soldiers, and by entering into the treaty of Brest-Litovsk, Russia became not only of no help to the Allies but of great assistance to our enemies by releasing many German troops from the eastern front and permitting their transfer to the western front to engage in the great drive of March and April, 1918. So it may be fairly said that the Bolshevik government, under the lead of Lenin and Trotski, turned out in fact, though not technically, to be an ally and help of Germany.

It is well known that the government of Lenin and Trotski had its origin in violence, in murder, and in rapine, and that by inaugurating a reign of terror it has been enabled to maintain itself to a certain extent in certain portions of Russia. This government, such as it is, is of the most radical and socialistic character, verging in many instances on anarchism.

The Russian soldiers had become weary of the war from long, hard service and lack of supplies and ammunition. They returned home for rest. The great bulk of the Russian peasants are a quiet, uneducated, and inoffensive people. Owing to the character of these people, to the spirit in which the soldiers returned, and to the indirect assistance that German officers have rendered, the Bolshevik government has been enabled to maintain in certain localities a species of government, but it is a government maintaining itself by a system of terrorism and by appealing to the rabble with the most radical brand of socialism.

It is impossible for Russia again to become a great nation of law and order under such men and such a system of government as that of Lenin and Trotski. It may take some time, with outside help, for Russia to find herself and to be rid of this terrible incubus.

I am satisfied in my own mind that if the Allies had rendered the Russian people a little more effective assistance some six or eight months ago the government of Lenin and Trotski would long ago have ceased to exist. If there had been an army of 15,000 or 20,000 men at Archangel and Murmansk who could have gone down the railroad and united with Kolchak's army at Vologda, between the united forces they could have easily captured Petrograd; and if a similar force had been sent to the Crimea or southern Russia to aid the army of Denikine the Bolsheviki could have been easily expelled from the Ukraine and from Little and White Russia.

To my mind it would be a great act of mercy to aid the Russian people to shake off this Bolshevik government and to leave the Russian people free to elect a constituent assembly for the purpose of determining their own future. The Bolshevik government not only broke up the last constituent assembly, but it has also refused to make any provision for another such body of men.

Having seized power by force and terror, they seek to maintain themselves by such means. So far as the welfare of Russia is concerned, the course of the Bolshevik government is suicidal. It is a principle of criminal jurisprudence that—

Whoever is present actually or constructively encouraging the violent and illegal death of another is responsible for such death, even though it was voluntarily submitted to by the deceased. (1 Whart., sec. 575.)

While I do not claim that our Nation would be guilty to the same extent or in the same manner as in the case cited, yet I believe there is in this case a moral responsibility resting upon the Allies as well as upon our country to help the Russian people to be rid of this bloody terror.

Holding these views as I do, I have never been able to reconcile myself to the clamor that has existed in certain quarters in respect to maintaining troops in Russia. I think the American soldiers were rightfully there, and that it would have been wiser to have aided them to a greater extent in accomplishing the relief of Russia. It is true some of our soldiers who have been over in Russia are homesick and anxious to get home. That is the case with most soldiers when there is no fighting to do. As soon as the fighting was done in the Argonne in November, 1918, our soldiers were eager to get back, homesick, as it were. Still, no one can criticize our soldiers in Siberia for being homesick and anxious to return home. Yet I feel that the Allies have been guilty of unintentionally, perhaps, prolonging the sufferings of Russia.

In the meantime, while the conditions that are now prevailing in Russia continue to exist, Germany will have a great field for her political and commercial propaganda in that country. Ambassador Francis, in his statement before the committee investigating the Bolshevik system, stated that even before the war Germany had absorbed much of the commercial and industrial business of Russia; in fact, that in certain lines of industry she had secured a complete monopoly. With the Bolshevik government simply eager to maintain itself at any cost and by any methods and means, Germany, by acquiescing in these methods and system, will have a free hand to exploit Russia, and Russia will thus become to a large extent an adjunct, commercially and industrially, if not politically, of Germany.

It must be evident to everyone who has given the subject consideration and attention that it is utterly out of the question to establish and maintain a permanent government of law and order in Russia under the principles and methods and system of the Bolshevik government. The Russian people, before they can establish a free government of law and order, must first of all be rid of the Bolshevik crowd, and I believe it is the moral duty of the Allies to help the Russian people to be relieved from this terrible incubus.

The history of the past affords us a lesson on this point. France, in 1871, after the German invasion in the Franco-Prussian war, had an experience somewhat similar to that of Russia at the present time, though on a more limited scale. In March, 1871, after the Germans had captured the city of Paris in the so-called first siege and were still occupying a part of the city and its suburbs, the revolution of the so-called Commune, composed of ultrasocialists, radicals, and anarchists, broke out, resulting in horrible excesses of murder, bloodshed, and the destruction of life and property. The Commune were in control from the middle of March until near the end of May, 1871, and this period had been termed the second siege of Paris. Aside from its destructive and leveling character, the avowed aim of the Commune was to establish a government consisting of a federation of all the municipal communes in France, a plan somewhat similar to the Soviet system of the Bolsheviki government in Russia. The occupation of a part of Paris and its suburbs by German troops aided Marshal MacMahon, at the head of some French troops, finally to suppress the Commune and restore law and order to a war weary and exhausted France.

Russia to-day needs the same remedy—the suppression of the Bolsheviki—for its rehabilitation and the restoration of an orderly government based upon the will of a freely and duly elected constituent assembly.

Mr. President, in some of the debates that occurred some time ago, it was attempted to draw lessons in connection with the treaty pending before the Senate from the treaties that occurred at the close of the Napoleonic wars. It eemed to me at the time far-fetched, and I have taken occasion to look up those matters; and I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate while I call attention to those treaties.

The close of the Napoleonic wars resulted in a number of treaties. Among these may be mentioned the Treaty of Chaumont of March 1, 1814. Napoleon was then at bay, and was fast being driven over the boundaries into France, and the chief aim of the treaty was to provide for the vigorous prosecution of the war. With that end in view, the treaty provided that each of the four allied powers should provide and maintain a field army of 150,000 men. The treaty further provided that neither of them should make peace or a truce without the consent of the others, and that they would protect each other against future aggressions of France—the power, under the lead of Napoleon, against which they were then making war. Article 16 aimed "to maintain the equilibrium of Europe"—another name for "status quo"—"to secure the repose and independence of its States and to prevent the invasions which during so many years had desolated the world."

The next treaty of importance was the treaty of the so-called first peace of Paris of May 30, 1814. This was after Napoleon had been vanquished, forced to abdicate, and was about to be sent to the Island of Elba. While Napoleon was in power he had broken up many of the big and small States in Europe. Some he had annexed outright to France; others he had set up nominally as independent States, but really under the control and tutelage of France. The main purpose of this treaty was to relegate France to the boundaries of 1792, and to restore the States he had seized and annexed to the status they had occupied before being seized and annexed. The treaty also related to the restoration of other property which Napoleon had seized, as well as to the restoration by the Allies of the lands and property they had captured during the war. As is well known, Napoleon left the Island of Elba and returned to France in the spring of 1815 to resume the control of France and resume the war against his enemies. This resulted in the Treaty of Vienna of March 25, 1815. This was a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance against Napoleon, prescribing the force which each of the Allies must keep in. The preamble of the treaty outlines its purpose, and is as follows:

In the name of the most holy and undivided Trinity.

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and His Majesty the Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary and of Bohemia, having taken into consideration the consequences which the invasion of France by Napoleon Bonaparte, and the actual situation of that Kingdom, may produce with respect to the safety of Europe, have resolved, in conjunction with His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias and His Majesty the King of Prussia, to apply to that important circumstance the principles consecrated by the Treaty of Chaumont.

They have consequently resolved to renew, by a solemn treaty, signed separately by each of the four powers with each of the three others, the engagement to preserve against every attack the order of things so happily established in Europe and to determine upon the most effectual means of fulfilling that engagement, as well as of giving it all the extension of which the present circumstances so imperiously call for.

Napoleon having been defeated at Waterloo and sent to St. Helena, this resulted in the treaty of Paris of November 20, 1815. This treaty relegated France to her frontiers of 1790, and otherwise changed and modified her boundaries, prescribed the indemnities she was required to pay, provided for occupation of part of her territory as security for the indemnity, and provided for carrying out the treaty of Paris of May 30, 1814, and the treaty of the Congress of Vienna of June 9, 1815.

The Congress of Vienna was the final episode of the great Napoleonic wars. It was a gathering of sovereigns, absolute and autocratic. Napoleon had not only disrupted or destroyed many States of Europe, but he had bred a spirit of unrest among their downtrodden subjects. Aside from England, Norway, and Switzerland all the Governments of Europe were more or less absolute and autocratic. The people, even where they had aspirations for freer governments, were not qualified to inaugurate or maintain such governments. True, there was a spirit of unrest, an aftermath of the many and frequent wars, but it was crude in aspirations and prone to obtain results by more or less violence. It was to suppress such aspirations and such violence and to maintain intact the various dynasties of legitimacy, of which there were then many more, especially in Germany and Austria, than to-day. The suppression of Napoleon and the restoration of the status quo ante bellum was the chief aim of the sovereigns who sat around the peace table at Vienna. They feared the spirit of Napoleon and the revolutionary spirit of unrest prevailing among the people. The first, they caged at St. Helena; the other, they sought to smother with their drastic laws and huge armies.

There is nothing in any of these treaties to which I have referred that is akin to or suggestive of the league of nations as provided for in this treaty; and there is nothing in the facts or environment out of which those treaties arose which can in any wise guide us or instruct us in the consideration of the present emergency.

Potentates like Alexander of Russia, Francis I of Austria, and Frederick William of Prussia, together with such heartless and wily statesmen as Metternich and Talleyrand, should not be compared with Clemenceau, Lloyd-George, Woodrow Wilson, Sonnino, and Veniselos. As there is a vast difference between these two classes of men so there is even greater difference in the task they performed and the work they wrought.

When we scan the entire scope of this treaty, the vast field it covered, and the difficult problems it had to meet, we can not help but admire the wisdom and skill of these men of the twentieth century, before whom the men of 1814 and 1815 pale into insignificance. These men of the past operated in a world of the past, entirely different from the world of to-day. They labored under two nightmares, fear of Napoleon and anxiety for the maintenance of the so-called dynastic legitimacy. To draw a lesson from these men and their work is a far more difficult task than trying to draw nitrate from the atmosphere.

The sovereigns of Austria, Prussia, and Russia, being still alarmed over the spirit of unrest which prevailed among their subjects and being anxious to establish their divine right as rulers, and to make their subjects believe that they were governed, or rather oppressed, under the principles of the Christian religion, on the 26th of September, 1815, entered into the so-called treaty of holy alliance. The preamble of this treaty reads as follows, and is the true key of the treaty:

IN THE NAME OF THE MOST HOLY AND INVISIBLE TRINITY.

Holy alliance of sovereigns of Austria, Prussia, and Russia. Their majesties the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor of Russia, having, in consequence of the great events which have marked the course of the three last years in Europe, and especially of the blessings which it has pleased Divine Providence to shower down upon those States which place their confidence and their hope on it alone, acquired the intimate conviction of the necessity of settling the steps to be observed by the powers, in their reciprocal relations, upon the sublime truths which the holy religion of our Saviour teaches.

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICAL RELATIONS.

They solemnly declare that the present act has no other object than to publish, in the face of the world, their fixed resolution, both in the administration of their respective States, and in their political relations with every other Government, to take for their sole guide the precepts of that holy religion, namely, the precepts of justice, Christian charity, and peace, which, far from being applicable only to private concerns, must have an immediate influence on the councils of princes, and guide all their steps, as being the only means of consolidating human institutions and remedying their imperfections. In consequence, their majesties have agreed on the following articles.

The treaty purports to be an alliance between these sovereigns and the holy Christian religion and our Saviour. We who are familiar with the use made of this treaty by these sovereigns know that it was rather an alliance between the powers of evil and darkness. And the wickedness of it is the garb of hypocrisy under which it was carried on, under which millions of poor people were oppressed. Such a treaty, it seems to me, can be neither a guide nor a warning to us of to-day, nor can the other treaties to which I have referred, and the conditions out of which they arose, afford us any guide to the present treaty, its origin, or its purposes.

Let the dead past bury its dead!
Act, act in the living present!
Heart within and God o'erhead!

I now come to discuss the second reservation reported by the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ON THE TREATY AND COVENANT.

The Poles rendered the Allies, as well as our country, great assistance in the recent war. This assistance they gave by enlisting in large numbers in our own Army and by forming an independent Polish Corps to aid in the war, and also by large desertions to the Russians from the German and Austrian armies. They were promised their independence with one accord by our people. The President, in his speech of January 10, 1918, where he laid down the so-called 14 points, declared that Poland was entitled to her independence and should be restored.

The Czecho-Slovenes of Bohemia, Moravia, and Slovakia have also been of great assistance in the war. A large number enlisted in our armies and in the armies of the Allies; and a large number of them during the war deserted to the Russian forces, thereby greatly weakening the power of Germany and Austria. They have also rendered great service in keeping open the Siberian Railroad from Vladivostok to the Ural Mountains; that road which has been reconstructed and put in condition by American engineers under the lead of Mr. Stevens. These Czecho-Slovaks were encouraged to believe that they would secure the independence of their country for which they had long aspired, especially in view of the great help and service they rendered to the cause of the Allies in this war.

In pursuance of these services and these encouragements and promises, the treaty of peace provides for an independent Poland and an independent Czecho-Slovak State. Articles 81–86, both inclusive, of the treaty relate to the establishment of the Czecho-Slovak State. Articles 87 and 88, together with an annex of six paragraphs, and articles 89–93, both inclusive, relate to the establishment of the Polish Nation.

Our country, by adopting this treaty with the articles I have mentioned in it, in connection with our allies, practically aids, as far as it is possible to do so by treaty, in setting up these two countries to which I have referred as independent States; to my mind a most laudable and fully justified action in which our people and our country can well take pride.

Having participated in giving birth to these two States, it seems to me that it is the duty of our country—at least by its moral force and strength, as distinguished from mere physical or military force—to see to it that these new States continue to live. We can not, after ratifying the treaty, afford to have them die stillborn.

Our country has always had, and will continue to have, aside from its mere military power, a great moral influence and weight in the affairs of the world. When Grover Cleveland issued his Venezuela message to England, we had a very scant Army and not a very great fleet as compared with England; yet England acquiesced in the terms of that message. The moral strength of a great nation—our Nation—was such that this message could not be, and was not, ignored. No nation will to-day or hereafter stand ready to defy the sober opinion or earnest wishes of the United States. Our influence will be all the greater if not accompanied with a brandishing of swords or the threat of war.

The second reservation reported by the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations is wholly oblivious of these principles and of this factor. I quote the reservation, which is as follows:

2. The United States declines to assume, under the provisions of article 10, or under any other article, any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between other nations, members of the league or not, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States in such controversies, or to adopt economic measures for the protection of any other country, whether a member of the league or not, against external aggression or for the purpose of coercing any other country or for the purpose of intervention in the internal conflicts or other controversies which may arise in any other country, and no mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, part 1, of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

This reservation, it will be perceived, in its entirety throws overboard and scatters to the four winds by its disavowals the whole moral weight and influence of the United States. It not only does that, but it says to Poland and Czechoslovakia, "Although we have joined the Allies in giving you statehood, we are wholly indifferent to your future welfare. It is no concern of ours whether you live or perish as a State. It is true we have breathed a little life into you by this treaty, but having done that we wash our hands of the whole business. We have no further concern in your future well-being." This is akin to the poor, disconsolate, helpless mother who deposits in a basket her unfortunate offspring on the doorsteps of some person who she hopes will take care of the poor infant and then leaves it without a trace of herself.

So here you deposit the new States of Poland and Czechoslovakia on the doorsteps of Germany, Russia, Austria, and Hungary, and then you propose in cold blood by your reservation to leave them entirely in the power of those great nations. The poor mother has good reason to believe that her infant will fall into friendly hands. You know that your two political infants will not fall into friendly hands; that their lives will be in danger from the very start; and yet you aid in their paternity!

To be consistent, if you adopt the reservation I have quoted, you should reject the provisions of the treaty relating to Poland and Czechoslovakia. The course of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], whom I greatly admire and respect, is much more consistent than that proposed by the majority of the committee. At least, his plan does not involve the creation of two new States and their abandonment, helpless and without concern, among hostile neighbors and unfriendly surroundings. Why should these new States not be entitled to the moral support and influence of our country, to all the support that can be given them aside from the resort to war? Our country will have an immense and effective influence, if it exerts it, to restrain hostile action without going to war. These new States are entitled, by reason of their creation and by reason of the services their people rendered to the cause of the Allies, to all the help we can give them short of war to maintain their existence. We boast of our unselfishness in this war and, to a large extent, this is warranted. But would it not be the height of selfishness to set up these new States and then to declare that their future welfare did not concern us; that we did not care as to what happened to them or became of them?

Yet this is precisely what is done in the second reservation. Mark the following words:

The United States declines to assume * * * any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country—

And so forth.

What is this language but a notice to Germany, Austria, Hungary, and Russia that while we have joined with the Allies in establishing these two new States, their future existence and future welfare is no concern of ours. By the terms of the reservation we do not regard ourselves under "any obligation," not even morally or diplomatically, for "any other country," not even for the two infant States we have joined in creating. There could be no more complete disavowal of our total indifference to the future existence of these States.

Reserving to ourselves the right of making and declaring war, regardless of the league, would be an ample reservation, and would leave the door open for our country to exert its moral strength through diplomatic channels for preserving the outer integrity of these new States, and, above all, it would not proclaim to the world that we are wholly oblivious and indifferent to their continued existence as free and independent States. To my mind the danger of future war lurks in Germany. The same old spirit is there. The establishment and maintenance of these two new States will be one of the best curbs and brakes on the military autocracy of Germany, and, above all, it will prove a great blessing to the people of those new States, who have been so long oppressed.

Mr. President, while I can support the other reservations, this reservation in its present form I can not support.

In conclusion permit me, Mr. President, to say that while I can not exclaim, as a Senator did in his speech on the treaty a short time ago, that "I was born an American," I can at least claim that, like Nicodemus, I have long ago been born again as an American in soul and in spirit. I think I can honestly and truly claim that ever since I attained years of discretion I have aimed to be a good, loyal American, in war and in peace, and I leave to my fellow citizens to determine whether I have succeeded in this aim. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the Secretary may proceed with the reading of the treaty.

Mr. SMOOT. There are so few Senators present that I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harris	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Hitchcock	New	Smoot
Capper	Johnson, S. Dak.	Newberry	Spencer
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sterling
Cummins	Kellogg	Nugent	Swanson
Curtis	Kendrick	Page	Thomas
Dillingham	Kenyon	Phipps	Townsend
Elkins	Keyes	Pittman	Trammell
Fletcher	Kirby	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Reed	Warren
Gay	Lodge	Sheppard	Watson
Gronna	McCumber	Simmons
Hale	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Harding	McNary	Smith, Md.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] are detained from the Senate by illness. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] are detained on official business. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I announced to the Senate a day or two ago that I should ask the privilege of addressing it this afternoon. I find that I am not ready to go on, and I give notice that I shall speak on the league of nations next Monday. I understand an agreement has been arrived at for adjournment until next Monday when we adjourn to-day.

Mr. LODGE. Before the reading of the treaty begins, I move that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not like to see the Senate adjourn until Monday. I should like to see it proceed just as rapidly as possible with the treaty. It ought to be disposed of very soon. I am ready to vote on it now or at any time, but I know that on an important matter like this the Senate very frequently, out of consideration for Senators who are not prepared to speak or go on with the consideration of the measure, either adjourns over or lays aside the matter then before the Senate, and takes up other matters. I had expected something of this kind in connection with the treaty, and had hoped that if such a thing should happen the Senate could take up the water-power legislation until it might be ready to go on with the treaty.

I would not want to do anything to retard or delay action upon the peace treaty, but rather than adjourn over for a day I would like to see the Senate take up the water-power legislation. That is very important legislation and ought to be disposed of at an early date. The House bill has been reported and is now on the calendar. But some of the Senators who are interested in water-power legislation are not desirous of taking it up to-morrow and therefore I shall not insist upon the Senate doing so, and under those circumstances will not vote against the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will say that a discussion of the matter of adjourning over until Monday developed the fact that it might really facilitate progress with the treaty. If we agree to that motion, I understand, it is expected that we will then proceed with the reading of the treaty to-night and make very substantial progress before the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. LODGE. It is my intention to go on with the reading of the treaty and make substantial progress, as the Senator from Nebraska has said. I do not intend that the Senate shall adjourn over Saturdays; far from it; I mean to ask the Senate to remain in session, but a number of Senators are away. They took advantage of the two days' holiday, practically, and went away, two of them certainly on account of illness, and with the understanding that there would be no voting before next week. As no one seems ready to go on to-morrow, I did not think there would be any material progress made, and in deference to those Senators I have made the motion, which I hope will prevail.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to say just a word with reference to the suggestion made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] regarding the water-power bill. Next to the peace treaty the water-power bill is the most important measure upon the Senate Calendar. I wish to say that I shall oppose, at any time that it may be proposed, the bringing up of that important bill until the peace treaty has been disposed of. I do not think that anything should intervene in the consideration of the peace treaty, and especially a bill of such importance ought not to be brought up before the treaty is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the reading of the treaty may be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will continue the reading of the treaty.

The Secretary resumed the reading at the top of page 21, in article 4, of part 1, of the treaty, and read as follows:

"The Council shall meet from time to time as occasion may require, and at least once a year, at the Seat of the League, or at such other place as may be decided upon.

"The Council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the League or affecting the peace of the world.

"The secretaries and staff of the Secretariat shall be appointed by the Secretary General with the approval of the Council.

"The Secretary General shall act in that capacity at all meetings of the Assembly and of the Council.

"All positions under or in connection with the League, including the Secretariat, shall be open equally to men and women.

"Representatives of the Members of the League and officials of the League when engaged on the business of the League shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities.

"The buildings and other property occupied by the League or its officials or by Representatives attending its meetings shall be inviolable.

"Article 8.

"The Members of the League recognise that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations.

"The Council, taking account of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State, shall formulate plans for such reduction for the consideration and action of the several Governments.

"Such plans shall be subject to reconsideration and revision at least every ten years.

"After these plans shall have been adopted by the several Governments, the limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the Council.

"The Members of the League agree that the manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war is open to grave objections. The Council shall advise how the evil effects attendant upon such manufacture can be prevented, due regard being had to the necessities of those Members of the League which are not able to manufacture the munitions and implements of war necessary for their safety.

"The Members of the League undertake to interchange full and frank information as to the scale of their armaments, their military, naval, and air programmes and the condition of such of their industries as are adaptable to war-like purposes.

"Article 9.

"A permanent Commission shall be constituted to advise the Council on the execution of the provisions of Articles 1 and 8 and on military, naval, and air questions generally.

"Article 10.

"The Members of the League undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all Members of the League. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the Council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

"Article 11.

"Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the Members of the League or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole League, and the League shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. In case any such emergency should arise the Secretary General shall on the request of any Member of the League forthwith summon a meeting of the Council.

"It is also declared to be the friendly right of each Member of the League to bring to the attention of the Assembly or of the Council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

"Article 12.

"The Members of the League agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the Council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the Council.

"In any case under this Article the award of the arbitrators shall be made within a reasonable time, and the report of the Council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute.

"Article 13.

"The Members of the League agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration.

"Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach, are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration.

"For the consideration of any such dispute the court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be the Court agreed on by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them.

"The Members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered, and that they will not resort to war against a Member of the League which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such an award, the Council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.

"Article 14.

"The Council shall formulate and submit to the Members of the League for adoption plans for the establishment of a Permanent Court of International Justice. The Court shall be competent to hear and determine any dispute of an international character which the parties thereto submit to it. The Court may also give an advisory opinion upon any dispute or question referred to it by the Council or by the Assembly.

"Article 15.

"If there should arise between Members of the League any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with article 13, the Members of the League agree that they will submit the matter to the Council. Any party to the dispute may effect such submission by giving notice of the existence of the dispute to the Secretary General, who will make all necessary arrangements for a full investigation and consideration thereof.

"For this purpose the parties to the dispute will communicate to the Secretary General, as promptly as possible, statements of their case with all the relevant facts and papers, and the Council may forthwith direct the publication thereof.

"The Council shall endeavor to effect a settlement of the dispute, and if such efforts are successful a statement shall be made public giving such facts and explanations regarding the dispute and the terms of settlement thereof as the Council may deem appropriate.

"If the dispute is not thus settled, the Council either unanimously or by a majority vote shall make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto.

"Any Member of the League represented on the Council may make public a statement of the facts of the dispute and of its conclusions regarding the same.

"If a report by the Council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the Representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the Members of the League agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.

"If the Council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the Representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the Members of the League reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.

"If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the Council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the Council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

"The Council may in any case under this article refer the dispute to the Assembly. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within 14 days after the submission of the dispute to the Council."

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in article 8, on page 31, after line 8, to insert:

(2) Whenever the case referred to the assembly involves a dispute between one member of the league and another member whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the assembly, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

Mr. LODGE. Amendment No. 2 is dependent upon and involved in the first amendment; and I ask that it be passed over temporarily, so that we may take up the two amendments together.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is to be passed over, I assume, under the same conditions that the other amendment was passed over.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; under the same conditions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be temporarily passed over.

The Secretary resumed the reading, and read as follows:

"In any case referred to the Assembly, all the provisions of this Article and of Article 12 relating to the action and powers of the Council shall apply to the action and powers of the Assembly, provided that a report made by the Assembly, if concurred in by the Representatives of those Members of the League represented on the Council and of a majority of the other Members of the League, exclusive in each case of the Representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the Council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the Representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

"Article 16.

"Should any Member of the League resort to war in disregard of its covenants under Articles 12, 13, and 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other Members of the League, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a Member of the League or not.

"It shall be the duty of the Council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military, naval or air force the Members of the League shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the League.

"The Members of the League agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this Article, in order to minimise the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking State, and that they will take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the Members of the League which are co-operating to protect the covenants of the League.

"Any Member of the League which has violated any covenant of the League may be declared to be no longer a Member of the League by a vote of the Council concurred in by the Representatives of all the other Members of the League represented thereon.

"Article 17.

"In the event of a dispute between a Member of the League and a State which is not a Member of the League, or between States not Members of the League, the State or States not Members of the League shall be invited to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, upon such conditions as the Council may deem just. If such invitation is accepted, the provisions of Articles 12 to 16 inclusive shall be applied with such modifications as may be deemed necessary by the Council.

"Upon such invitation being given the Council shall immediately institute an inquiry into the circumstances of the dispute and recommend such action as may seem best and most effectual in the circumstances.

"If a State so invited shall refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, and shall resort to war against a Member of the League, the provisions of Article 16 shall be applicable as against the State taking such action.

"If both parties to the dispute when so invited refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, the Council may take such measures and make such recommendations as will prevent hostilities and will result in the settlement of the dispute.

"Article 18.

"Every treaty or international engagement entered into hereafter by any Member of the League shall be forthwith registered with the Secretariat and shall as soon as possible be published by it. No such treaty or international engagement shall be binding until so registered.

"Article 19.

"The Assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by Members of the League of treaties which have become inapplicable and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace of the world.

"Article 20.

"The Members of the League severally agree that this Covenant is accepted as abrogating all obligations or understandings inter se which are inconsistent with the terms thereof, and solemnly undertake that they will not hereafter enter into any engagements inconsistent with the terms thereof.

"In case any Member of the League shall, before becoming a Member of the League, have undertaken any obligations inconsistent with the terms of this Covenant, it shall be the duty of such Member to take immediate steps to procure its release from such obligations.

"Article 21.

"Nothing in this Covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

"Article 22.

"To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this Covenant.

"The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations who by reason of their resources, their experience or their geographical position can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as Mandatories on behalf of the League.

"The character of the mandate must differ according to the stage of the development of the people, the geographical situation of the territory, its economic conditions and other similar circumstances.

"Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognised subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a Mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the Mandatory.

"Other peoples, especially those of Central Africa, are at such a stage that the Mandatory must be responsible for the administration of the territory under conditions which will guarantee freedom of conscience and religion, subject only to the maintenance of public order and morals, the prohibition of abuses such as the slave trade, the arms traffic and the liquor traffic, and the prevention of the establishment of fortifications or military and naval bases and of military training of the natives for other than police purposes and the defence of territory, and will also secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other Members of the League.

"There are territories, such as South-West Africa and certain of the South Pacific Islands, which, owing to the sparseness of their population, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centres of civilisation, or their geographical contiguity to the territory of the Mandatory, and other circumstances, can be best administered under the laws of the Mandatory as integral portions of its territory, subject to the safeguards above mentioned in the interests of the indigenous population.

"In every case of mandate, the Mandatory shall render to the council an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

"The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the Mandatory shall, if not previously agreed upon by the Members of the League, be explicitly defined in each case by the Council.

"A permanent Commission shall be constituted to receive and examine the annual reports of the Mandatories and to advise the Council on all matters relating to the observance of the mandates.

"Article 23.

"Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the Members of the League:

"(a) will endeavour to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labour for men, women, and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organisations;

"(b) undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control;

"(c) will entrust the League with the general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children, and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs;

"(d) will entrust the League with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest;

"(e) will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communications and of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all Members of the League. In this connection, the special necessities of the regions devastated during the war of 1914–1918 shall be borne in mind;

"(f) will endeavour to take steps in matters of international concern for the prevention and control of disease.

"Article 24.

"There shall be placed under the direction of the League all international bureaux already established by general treaties if the parties to such treaties consent. All such international bureaux and all commissions for the regulation of matters of international interest hereafter constituted shall be placed under the direction of the League.

"In all matters of international interest which are regulated by general conventions but which are not placed under the control of international bureaux or commissions, the Secretariat of the League shall, subject to the consent of the Council and if desired by the parties, collect and distribute all relevant information and shall render any other assistance which may be necessary or desirable.

"The Council may include as part of the expenses of the Secretariat the expenses of any bureau or commission which is placed under the direction of the League.

Article 25.

"The Members of the League agree to encourage and promote the establishment and co-operation of duly authorised voluntary national Red Cross organizations, having as purposes the improvement of health, the prevention of disease and the mitigation of suffering throughout the world.

"Article 26.

"Amendments to this Covenant will take effect when ratified by the Members of the League whose Representatives compose the Council and by a majority of the Members of the League whose Representatives compose the Assembly.

"No such amendment shall bind any Member of the League which signifies its dissent therefrom, but in that case it shall cease to be a Member of the League.

"II. FIRST SECRETARY GENERAL OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"The Honourable Sir James Eric Drummond, K. C. M. G., C. B."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that concludes the reading of part 1 of the treaty, covering the league of nations. I understand the Chair has some matters which ought to be laid before the Senate. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed legislative business.

GERMAN PROPAGANDA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of 5,500 copies of the hearings and 10,000 copies of the report of the committee, entitled "Brewing and Liquor Interests and German Propaganda and Bolshevik Propaganda," which was to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That there be printed 2,500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 62, Sixty-sixth Congress, entitled "Brewing and Liquor Interests and German and Bolshevik Propaganda," of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for the use of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 7632. An act to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to ratify, approve, and confirm sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, relating to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory, as herein amended, and amending the laws relating thereto," approved March 28, 1916, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

TOWN OF PETERSBURG, ALASKA.

H. R. 7709. An act to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum, not exceeding $75,000, for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant and for the construction of a public-school building, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill, and I wish to make a very brief statement concerning it.

This bill is identical with the bill which the Senate passed only a few days ago, and I would like to have the House bill passed. The Senate bill has not yet been sent to the House, and upon the passage of this bill the Senate bill can be indefinitely postponed, and it will close up the whole matter.

I will state that, so far as the bill is concerned, it affects only the town of Petersburg, Alaska. That is a little town in the neighborhood of Juneau having about 150 voters. This whole matter was up before the people, was voted on there, and the vote was in favor of the bond issue by 145 to 4.

Mr. THOMAS. Let the bill be read, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Before it is read, I ask the Senator from Indiana—this being the same bill that was passed by the Senate on Tuesday, I think—whether, if it is referred to the Committee on Territories, the Senator can not immediately report it out and ask unanimous consent for its consideration?

Mr. NEW. Very well; let that course be adopted.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered to issue bonds in any sum, not exceeding $75,000, for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant, and for the construction of a public-school building.

SEC. 2. That before said bonds shall be issued a special election shall be ordered by the common council of the town of Petersburg, at which election the question of whether such bonds shall be issued shall be submitted to the qualified electors of said town of Petersburg whose names appear on the last assessment roll of said town for municipal taxation. Thirty days' notice of such election shall be given by publication thereof in a newspaper printed and published and of general circulation in said town before the day fixed for such election.

SEC. 3. That the registration for such election, the manner of conducting the same, and the canvass of the returns of said election shall be, as near as practicable, in accordance with the requirements of law in general or special elections in said municipality, and said bonds shall be issued only upon condition that a majority of the votes cast at such election in said town shall be in favor of issuing said bonds.

SEC. 4. That the bonds above specified, when authorized to be issued as hereinbefore provided, shall bear interest at a rate to be fixed by the common council of Petersburg, not to exceed 7 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and shall not be sold for less than their par value with accrued interest, and shall be in denominations not exceeding $1,000 each, the principal to be due in 20 years from date thereof: Provided, however, That the common council of said town of Petersburg may reserve the right to pay off such bonds in their numerical order at the rate of $5,000 thereof per annum from and after the expiration of five years from their date. Principal and interest shall be payable in lawful money of the United States of America at the office of the town treasurer, or at such bank in the city of New York, in the State of New York, or such place as may be designated by the common council of the town of Petersburg, the place of payment to be mentioned in the bonds: And provided further, That each and every such bond shall have the written signature of the mayor and clerk of said town of Petersburg, and also bear the seal of said town.

SEC. 5. That no part of the funds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be used for any purpose other than specified in this act. Said bonds shall be sold only in such amounts as the common council shall direct, and the proceeds thereof shall be disbursed for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned and under the order and direction of said common council from time to time as the same may be required for said purposes: Provided, That not to exceed $50,000 of the proceeds of the sale of said bonds shall be expended for the construction and installation of the electric light and power plant, and not to exceed $25,000 thereof shall be expended for the construction of the public-school building.

Mr. NEW. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it will be so referred.

Mr. NEW. As the Committee on Territories have acted upon the Senate bill, which is identical with the House bill, I report back the House bill from the committee favorably, with a request for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which he has reported from the Committee on Territories.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which Senate bill 2609, of like title and substance, was ordered to a third reading and passed will be reconsidered and the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE THOMPSON, OF OKLAHOMA.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. JOSEPH B. THOMPSON, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask that the resolutions just received from the House of Representatives be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOSEPH B. THOMPSON, a Representative from the State of Oklahoma.

Resolved, That a committee of 17 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senators from Oklahoma, and at their request, it becomes my painful duty to announce the death of Hon. JOSEPH B. THOMPSON, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma, yesterday afternoon on a train en route to this city.

He was a native of Texas, and in his adopted State, the State of Oklahoma, rose to the highest positions of trust and honor. At a future time an hour will be designated for eulogies on his life and character. For the present I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The resolutions (S. Res. 187) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. JOSEPH B. THOMPSON, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join a committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now adjourn.

Under the second resolution, the President pro tempore appointed Mr. OWEN, Mr. GORE, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. SHEPPARD, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. MYERS, Mr. PHIPPS, and Mr. JONES of New Mexico as the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, September 22, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, September 19, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Incline Thine ear, Father in Heaven, and hear our petition. Guide these, Thy servants in their deliberations that all their enactments may be in consonance with the eternal fitness of things.

The eyes of all our people are centered upon the National Congress that they may smooth away the rough places, bring harmony out of chaos, establish peace and justice to all classes and conditions of men, lead on to greater achievements and all that pertains to clean living, to pure government, under a Constitution which has served its purpose for a hundred and thirty-two years.

And now O Father, comfort us who are called upon to mourn the going of a Representative who has served faithfully his State and Nation for lo, these many years. Comfort us, his stricken wife and children, by the blessed hope of the immortality of the soul and praise be Thine through Him who died and lives to uphold and strengthen the sorrowing forever and aye. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PENSIONS.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE SIGNING OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER. Under a special order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized for 40 minutes. [Applause.]

CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, by your favor I was accorded the honor of addressing you on the anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution September 17. As it most fortunately happened that the reception to Gen. Pershing and the returning soldiers was arranged for that day, I very gladly deferred my address until to-day.

It was a happy coincidence that brought that reception at the Nation's Capital on the anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution. It was to preserve the Nation, born under that Constitution, and to vindicate its principles, that we sent that magnificent leader of armies and 2,000,000 of the best and noblest young manhood ever placed in arms across the seas. Their country greets them on their return with joy and gratitude, proud of their achievements, grateful for their service, and with a welcome that comes from the heart of every loyal American citizen to every American soldier called to service at home or abroad. We indulge the earnest wish and fervent hope that they may find amid the peace and plenty of this blessed country of ours both the desire and opportunity for service in civil life, in support of the Constitution and its established principles of liberty and justice, as worthily and as devotedly in peace as they have in war.

Eleven years after the Colonies declared their independence the Constitutional Convention assembled at Philadelphia. Its deliberations were commenced in May and were concluded with the adoption of the present Constitution September 17, 1787. The convention was in session 100 days.

Of the 55 members, 29 were university men, graduates of Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Princeton, Oxford, and Edinburgh. Washington and Franklin, for supreme intelligence and consummate tact, were easily at the head. Washington was then 55 years old, Franklin was 81. The two most profound and original thinkers were yet young men. Hamilton was 30, Madison 36. There were many others in the convention who possessed force, learning, and ability.

The framers of the Constitution were the most remarkable group of men ever associated in any governmental activity. It has been truly said that never in the history of the world has there been displayed so much insight into the principles of government, so much knowledge of the theory and practice of its different forms as that which accompanied the formation of the Constitution of the United States. James Madison, who knew intimately almost every member of the convention, who was never absent even for a single day from its meetings, and whose journal is the only authoritative record of the proceedings, near the close of his life thus wrote of its membership:

> I feel it my duty to express my profound and solemn conviction, derived from my intimate opportunity of observing and appreciating the views of the convention, that there never was an assembly of men, charged with a great and arduous trust, who were more pure in their motives or more exclusively or anxiously devoted to the object committed to them than were the members of the Federal convention of 1787.

The utmost anxiety attended the convening of the assembly. The delegates were slow to arrive. It was a week after the day fixed before even 7 of the 13 States were represented. The members who arrived appeared anxious and apprehensive. They realized that the work they were undertaking was vitally important and of tremendous difficulty. Indeed, the difficulties to be overcome seemed insurmountable. The confederacy had failed. Its requisitions were refused by the States. Commercial rivalry and discord between the States was pronounced. Open rebellion had appeared, foreign debts had become urgent, and the havoc of paper money had destroyed both business and confidence. Treaties had been violated and some of the States were threatening foreign alliances.

Confidence grew in the convention, however, with conference and debate. There was great divergence of opinion, but there was complete singleness of purpose. Compromises ended every serious disagreement. The wonder was not that differences existed, but that concessions on such great issues should have been obtained. No other assembly of like character in all history ever exhibited such wisdom, such courage, or such unselfish patriotism.

Once when the prospect for agreement seemed dark Washington addressed his associates, saying—

> It is possible that no plan that we propose will be adopted. Perhaps another dreadful conflict is to be sustained. If to please the people we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we afterwards defend our work? Let us here raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair; the event is in the hand of God.

Such was the spirit and such the high resolve of the convention, and out of it was born the Constitution.

It will not be expected that I should attempt a detailed analysis of the Constitution in this address; a general characterization will be sufficient.

The makers of the Constitution established a democracy, and at the same time created a strong government. They made the President responsible to the people, but they gave him more power than is exercised by English kings. They sought always to secure the free exercise of the people's will, but at the same time they placed obstacles in the path to sudden action impelled by passion, great excitement, or deep resentment. They made the will of the people supreme, but they were careful to provide that their real will and considered judgment and not transient impulse should be ascertained.

For these reasons they established a lawmaking body with two chambers and gave the President a limited veto power. They made the adoption of amendments to the Constitution a slow and difficult process to prevent hasty and illy considered changes in our fundamenal law. They established a Supreme Court to keep the executive and legislative departments within their constitutional bounds and to protect the rights of the people from usurpation and encroachment.

The framers of our Constitution made our Government a "government of laws and not of men," which means that no man's authority, that no exercise of arbitrary power of any kind shall deprive the citizen of his life or liberty or property without "due process of law." [Applause.] It is the very antithesis of a rule of might and of the exercise of autocratic power. It places the law above kings and presidents and governors; above generals and armies and military power; above all earthly authority not exercised under and in accordance with the Constitution.

Judged by theoretical standards our Constitution is the most scientific of any ever created. It is the strongest charter of liberty that ever was written. It is the acknowledged model of fundamental law. Never before was a system of government so wisely conceived, so comprehensive in its scope, so democratic in its operations, so regardful of the rights of the people, so adjustable to the progress and expansion of a great Nation. In its provisions making for stability and permanency, coupled with its encouragement and promotion of every form of progress and development, it is unique and unapproachable. No such measure of freedom for the individual, no such opportunity for the exercise of every power, the development of every faculty, and the unchecked fulfillment of every laudable ambition was ever before offered. Abraham Lincoln said:

> Nowhere in the world is presented a government of so much liberty and equality. To the humblest and poorest amongst us are held out the highest privileges and positions.

The high opinion here expressed is not only that of Americans. Mr. Gladstone, the greatest English statesman of the last century, characterized our Constitution as "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." Mr. Bryce, author of the American Commonwealth, the best commentary ever written on American institutions, said of the Government created by the Constitution that it was "the first true Federal State founded on a complete and scientific basis."

Judged by actual trial over a period of 132 years, the Constitution has been found successful in fullest measure. Under it the United States has grown and prospered as no other nation in all the history of the world has grown and prospered. Under it 13 struggling Colonies have grown to 48 great States. Under it the wealth of the Nation has grown to an extent that can not be paralelled by any other nation in existence. Under it the measure of individual liberty, of comfort, of generally diffused well-being and happiness is the envy and admiration of the world. To us it has come down as a priceless legacy, strengthened and broadened, and if we do not guard and cherish it we shall be unworthy of those who bequeathed it to us, as well as foolishly and stupidly regardless of our own best interests.

Perhaps never before in our history has there been so much criticism of the Constitution or so many attacks upon it as now. In every form, with every motive, from individuals and associations they come. There are those who would utterly destroy it. There are others who would change its essential features but retain its form. Social issues unknown to the fathers are pressing for determination impossible of constitutional sanction. Objects meritorious in their nature are urged, and if the Constitution stands in the way of easy and early accomplishment the Constitution is denounced and derided. Humanitarian projects, born of a generous and sympathetic realization of the misfortune and suffering of others, are advocated by earnest and sincere men and women, and if the remedy proposed is not within the scope of governmental power the Constitution is declared obsolete and should be discarded.

The spirit of unrest consequent upon and probably the inevitable result of the war has strengthened the feeling of injustice which always abides with the unfortunate and improvident. The bitter strife which sometimes awakens between workmen and their employers is intensified. The continued increase in the cost of the necessities of life as well as the increased demands for those things which have heretofore been considered as luxuries present most difficult problems for solution.

All these conditions combining make the present a period of trial, amounting almost to a crisis. In such condition we will be wise if we act only upon the most careful consideration. If ever there was a time when departures from our constitutional system were hazardous, it is now. Experiments in government are ever dangerous; they are especially so in times like these.

We are living in an era of mighty changes. The Great War has made a new map of the world. Empires have fallen. New nations have been born in a day. Thrones are overthrown and their former occupants have suffered death or fled to exile. Everywhere the spirit of revolt is manifest. Everything established is challenged. Even anarchy is praised by those who live where men are free. Restraint, even for the protection of the poor and weak, is condemned and defied. Any barrier against selfish aggrandizement is attacked. While such conditions exist abroad it is not surprising that a spirit of protest and revolt should make itself manifest in our own country.

Complaints against our Constitution are never justified as long as it is subject to amendment. The right of amendment is absolute and extends to every part of the instrument. Any change may be lawfully made in the Constitution that the people desire to make. If changes are not made, it is simply proof that the people do not desire them.

It is complained that amendments should be made easier. But it should be remembered that the Constitution is our fundamental law. It is the foundation upon which the entire governmental structure rests. It rests upon great principles; their abandonment or their modification should be fully understood and fully considered. There are always people who have theories and desire changes, and they are more numerous now than ever before. Over 100 amendments to the Constitution have been proposed to Congress within the last three years, involving 27 different subjects.

Sometimes a thing greatly desired but which can not be obtained except by amending the Constitution, with its consequent delay, leads to a demand for a method of immediate change. How unwise this would be is shown by the fact that in many instances the delay has resulted in such a reversal of public opinion that the proposed amendment has been abandoned.

On the other hand, if the amendment has real merit the demand for its adoption grows during the period of consideration, and the amendment will be secured as the reasoned, matured judgment of the people.

The socialists frankly admit that they would destroy our Constitution and our entire present system of government. A leading socialist journal ridicules the term "patriot fathers," as applied to the framers of the Constitution. It brands them as "grafters," and charges they were more concerned with their own selfish interests than with the interests of the people in framing the Constitution. The socialists are principally interested in the abolition of private property, and every extension of the powers of government by which private property is taken meets with their favor. Every constitutional guaranty for the protection of private property they would repeal. Government ownership in any form meets with their approval.

Although avowed Socialism does not seem to be making much progress, the drift toward Socialism through the avenue of Government ownership appears strong. The power of the Government to take over private property for public use given by the Constitution seems to be a method by which large advances in this direction may be made. If the abolition of all private property be considered with approval, then this tendency can be regarded with complacency. But unless we can look forward to the absorption by the Government of all business—the railroads, the canals and water traffic, the telegraphs, the telephones, the mines, the farms, the factories, the shops and stores—as a benefit and blessing, we should carefully consider every proposition looking to the extension of Government ownership. [Applause.]

Just now it is urged that the Government should take over the railroads. Constitutionally the Government may take private property for public use. It is thought that the Government might be justified in taking over the railroads for the purpose of carrying the mails, which would be a public use. If, however, the Government should purchase or condemn the railroads for the purpose of turning them over to private persons in whole or in part, such taking would not be justified. [Applause.]

The Constitution provides that no private property can be taken by the Government without just compensation to the owners. If the Government should purchase or condemn the railroads, it would mean increasing our national debt $20,000,000,000, with an increase in our annual taxes of $1,000,000,000 for interest. Besides, Government control now entails an annual expense of $1,000,000,000 above the revenues derived from operation, which would add another billion dollars to our annual expense. As a financial proposition the outlook would not appear especially alluring.

But this is only part of the socialistic program. It is also proposed that the Government take over the canals and all shipping, both foreign and domestic, as well as all the telegraphs, telephones, and other means of communication. The mines also are to be "socialized."

With the mild socialists the program outlined stops there. But with the radicals it goes on to the absorption and "nationalizing" of the farms, the factories, and all other productive facilities; the distribution and disposition of all products; in short, the abolishment of all private property, its confiscation by the Government, and the establishment of a socialized State in which the Government shall own all the property and control and regulate the lives of all the people.

Of course, that means not only an abandonment of the Constitution, but also of every fundamental principle of government that America represents. It will be said "the thing is impossible; the American people will never consent to such a revolutionary scheme." But if the Government absorbs the railroads and other means of transportation, and the telegraphs, telephones, and other means of communication, it can force upon the people the other steps in confiscation whether the people desire or not.

Soon the winter will come, with an almost certain shortage of coal. The demand will be insistent and well-nigh irresistible that the Government shall take over the mines. Forgetting that the Government has not improved railroad service by its control, forgetting even that the Government made such a lamentable failure of controlling the mines during the war, there will come a clamorous demand for Government ownership.

In some mysterious manner it is persistently believed that the men who may be in control of the railroads and mines as agents of the Government will be wiser and more successful than those who control them for the owners. It should be understood that it is vastly better and safer that such enterprises should be dependent for success on the approval of the people, as they are under private ownership, than that they should be in control of those who are indifferent to the approval of the public as long as they are approved by their superior officers. [Applause.] It should also be understood that the politicalization of industry can never be in the interest of the people. [Applause.] It will always be in the interest of the party in power, which will use all its powers of coercion and favoritism to perpetuate itself. In the end it will be an absolutism as ruthless as any ever known in history.

Upon the entrance of this Nation as a participant in the great European war came the sudden exercise by the Government of the war powers granted by the Constitution in such emergencies. Almost every act of the citizen was put under Federal regulation. His food, his fuel, his business, even his personal habits and accustomed diversions were placed under Government control. His property was taken from him by unprecedented exactions. His liberty was taken from him by universal conscription. He was forced to enter the ranks, submit to discipline and training, and then to be sent across seas to fight for his country on the field of battle.

But all this was justified, because the very existence of the Nation was endangered, and the Constitution provides that in such emergency every other provision must yield for the time being to the preservation of the Nation's existence.

As soon, however, as the war is ended and peace is declared, this extraordinary war power ceases, and the constitutional guaranties and limitations which have been superseded by the war powers during the emergency again come into full force and effect.

Every act passed by Congress which was only justified in the exercise of the war powers should be immediately repealed when peace is declared. [Applause.]

Every administrative order, military or civil, which depended for its validity upon the exercise of the war powers, should be at once revoked. No office, or bureau, or commission whose function was to assist in carrying on the war should be continued a day longer than the close of the war. [Applause.] No appeal for the continuance of such powers or offices should be entertained, if they are dependent alone upon the exercise of the war powers. Not a dollar should be appropriated from the Public Treasury for the continuance of such offices or the carrying on of such work which depends for its justification upon the existence of war. [Applause.]

This not only is our duty generally, it is a constitutional obligation resting upon the President, the Congress, and every military and administrative officer of the Government.

If there ever was a time when it was unwise to listen to the clamor of unjustifiable criticism, it is now. If there ever was a period when we should unhesitatingly repel attacks upon the Constitution from whatever quarter they may come, it is now. [Applause.] If there ever existed conditions which require that the people stand firm against any surrender of their constitutional powers, such conditions exist now. [Applause.]

Never until the present time has there been such serious attacks upon our Constitution. Throughout our past history the people have deeply reverenced and loved it. No foreign student but has noted this marked trait of the Nation's character. Our people have always considered the Constitution as the source from which we derived our ordered liberty and our individual protection. To it they have attributed in large measure our progress and the content and happiness of our people. Our national patriotism is based on our national charter.

And now there are those who would destroy it, and their attacks are vicious and vigorous. The people are hearing or reading these attacks. They are not students of government. Good men and women may be led to believe there is at least a measure of truth in these attacks unless they are met and refuted. We have been so confident of the supreme excellence of our Constitution and of its self-evident value that we have thought it unnecessary to even acquaint the people with its virtues, much less repel attacks.

But if that policy were ever justified it must be abandoned now. The question of the maintenance of our constitutional government should be made the supreme issue of the time. Beside that issue all others are small and insignificant. In defense of the Constitution all party lines should disappear. The Constitution is the Nation. Without it we should be something different from the United States of America. It is the foundation upon which our very existence is based.

Gentlemen of the House, I have spoken hitherto of the obligation which rests upon the membership in common with that of every American citizen. But we have a special and solemn obligation which particularly rests upon us. Every Member of the House before entering upon his duties was required to take an oath to support and defend the Constitution and to bear true faith and allegiance to the same.

Here within the House this obligation should ever bind us. As legislators we are the creatures of the Constitution. Its commands should always govern us. Its limitations should always restrain us. The powers which it confers upon us we should not surrender to any man or to any set of men. [Applause.] Its very spirit should guide us always, as the very pole-star of our purpose and our duty.

This obligation should rest upon us not only in the performance of our duties here, but also wherever and whenever by voice or pen we are privileged to reach and influence the people. Against this protest and rebellion we should stand as the steadfast champions and defenders of the Constitution. We should warn the people against the dangers that would follow its destruction. In some way the people should be made to know that the abolition of constitutional government in America means the beginning of anarchy, the inauguration of chaos.

And the danger is not fancied nor remote. It is here and impending. We should understand that Bolshevism is now an existing institution in the United States. The Communist party, recently organized, according to a statement issued by its secretary, belongs to the same group of International Socialists as the Bolsheviki of Russia. He declares that the party will take part in the 1920 campaign, and will have but one plank in its platform, the "domination of the working class and the abolition of capitalism."

There can be no possible excuse for the mischief-maker, much less the anarchist or terrorist, in this country. [Applause.] There is ample opportunity afforded for any change or reform that the people desire. The difficulty is that this class of men do not believe in a government of the people. They are unwilling to submit to the decision of a majority. It is minority rule, not majority rule, that they demand. They rail at the tyranny of the majority, and seek to substitute the tyranny of the minority. [Applause.] They denounce the autocracy of a government, and demand the autocracy of a faction. It is not the peoples' rule, it is class rule that they seek to establish.

There is no justification for disobedience to or defiance of the law in a country where the people make the law. There is no excuse for terrorism where free speech and a free press are guaranteed. There must be no submission to demands backed by threats when the way is open to secure the things demanded by peaceful means.

Chief Justice White, in a recent address, said:

> Look around in this great land to-day. Where is there a country like this? The world has never seen the equal of it.

And he adds—

> Many thoughtless persons to-day suppose that everything that is wrong is wrong in the institutions, when without the institutions there would be no right and everything wrong.

[Applause.]

And James Bryce, in summing up his review of American institutions, said.

> That America marks the highest level, not only of material well-being but of intelligence and happiness which the race has yet attained, will be the judgment of those who look not at the favored few for whose benefit the world seems hitherto to have framed its institutions, but at the whole body of the people.

And this highest level of material well-being and of intelligence and happiness the whole body of the people have attained under the Constitution, under American institutions, beneath "the gorgeous ensign of the Republic, now known and honored throughout the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original luster, not a stripe erased or polluted, nor a single star obscured."

To that Constitution, to those institutions, to our beloved country, we may well on this day pledge anew our devotion and fealty:

> What were our lives without thee?
> What all our lives to save thee?
> We reck not what we gave thee;
> We will not dare to doubt thee,
> But ask whatever else, and we will dare.

[Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the Governor of Virginia some time ago issued a proclamation asking our people to observe the anniversary of the signing of the Constitution, the anniversary which fell on last Wednesday and which we celebrate here to-day. In the time allowed me, for which I thank the House, I propose to notice but necessarily in bare outline the part taken by Virginia in the adoption of the Constitution.

It is almost certain the effort to create a more perfect union would have failed had any of the more-important States disapproved, and it appears beyond doubt that, in the absence of active initiation and approval by Virginia, which was the most populous and wealthy of the 13 States, failure would have resulted. As furnishing another reason for the reference to the part played by Virginia, I may be permitted to recall her lavish gifts to the military and political leadership of that time, the outstanding fact alluded to by Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, in such eloquent and generous terms in his address a few years ago to the Virginia State Bar Association. "What a constellation," he said, "then arose upon the sky. The list of her great names in that wonderful period is like a catalogue of fixed stars. For all time the American youth who would learn the principles of liberty protected by law; who would learn to frame constitutions and statutes; who would seek models of the character of the patriot, of the statesman, of the soldier may find instruction from her—may study her history as in a great university." [Applause.]

Following the War of the Revolution, the opinion was widespread that the Confederation as a system of government had proved, and would continue to prove, inadequate. Its weakness had nearly led to the defeat of the American cause, and during the several years after the decisive victory at Yorktown, while it was in effect, it furnished no means of preventing or curbing the political and economic trouble which had steadily increased until many of the first men of the country were in despair. Alexander Hamilton, who all through that period rendered the country such vigilant and priceless service, said, "The Confederation was formed amidst the agitation and tumult of society. It is composed of unsound materials put together in haste." James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, who was to become a member of the Supreme Court by appointment of the first President, said, "Those whom foreign strength could not overpower have well-nigh become the victims of internal anarchy." Madison, late in life, recalling the conditions of confusion, unrest, and lawlessness which he had witnessed, wrote:

"The close of the war brought no cure for the public embarrassment. The States, relieved from the pressure of foreign danger and flushed with the enjoyment of independence and sovereign power, instead of a diminished disposition to part with it, persevered in omissions and in measures incompatible with their relations to the Federal Government."

No man was more apprehensive of the disaster which would overtake the experiment in free government on this side of the ocean unless a substitute could be found for the Confederation than Washington himself, who, of course, can never cease to be thought of as the master builder of the Union—the soldier who, having won liberty with his sword, made it secure by his work as a statesman. [Applause.] Holding to the view of Hamilton, Wilson, and Madison, he exerted himself to impress it on his contemporaries, deploring, as he wrote to one of his friends, the "illiberality, jealousy, and local feeling of the States" as likely "to sink the new Nation in the eyes of Europe into contempt." Save for the prestige and influence of Washington and his unwearied support of the efforts to preserve the fruits of the Revolution by establishing a new Federal system, the attempt might have failed altogether, and in any event the Constitution as we have it to-day would not have come into operation, and therefore his is the supreme name to be remembered on the anniversary we are now celebrating.

Conferring at Mount Vernon with those who shared his fears and longings, Washington offered the suggestion which led to a preliminary meeting. Responding to that suggestion, on the 21st day of January, 1786, the Virginia Legislature passed a resolution designating commissioners to meet commissioners that might be appointed by the other States for the purpose of constructing a comprehensive and harmonious method of regulating commercial intercourse among the States, so as to avoid the rivalries and collisions which were a continual menace to the trade and prosperity of all. Two of the commissioners named in the resolution were Madison and Edmund Randolph, the latter afterwards Attorney General and Secretary of State.

In September of the same year the Virginia commissioners conferred at Annapolis, Md., with such commissioners as the other States had appointed, the only other States represented being New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, although Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and North Carolina had appointed commissioners who did not attend. One of the difficulties that impeded the political transactions of that time was due to the means of travel and communication being so meager. At no one session of the Philadelphia convention, for instance, were representatives present from all of the 12 States which had elected deputies. When the Virginia convention assembled, many months after the document had been drafted and signed, some of its members had not been able to procure a copy of the Constitution or a single copy of the Federalist. When the vote on ratification was cast in the Virginia convention it could not be known in Richmond that New Hampshire had already voted three days before, making the ninth State to ratify.

The conference at Annapolis was under the direction of Hamilton and Madison, who were determined to omit nothing which might further the establishment of a capable and efficient Government. Going beyond their instructions, the commissioners recommended that a convention should be called to take into consideration the general situation and devise whatever provisions might appear necessary to render the Federal Government adequate to the exigencies of the Union. It was the Legislature of Virginia that first accepted this recommendation, and gave emphasis to its action by appointing deputies, with Washington at their head, and by this example made a Federal convention possible. The light began to break when all of the States but one had followed this lead of Virginia.

The convention organized in Philadelphia on May 25, 1787, up to which time the deputies of fewer than eight States were in attendance. Supported by the North and the South, placed in nomination by a Pennsylvanian and seconded by a South Carolinian, Washington was unanimously chosen its President. [Applause.]

Touching the question, which has been a good deal discussed, as to who, if anyone, can be regarded as having first proposed any plan at all resembling that which is contained in the Constitution, I quote the following from the memorandum left by Madison, which is prefixed to his report of the debates of the convention:

As a sketch on paper—

He says—

the earliest, perhaps, of a constitutional government for the Union (organized with regular departments, with physical means operating on individuals), to be sanctioned by the people of the States acting in their original and sovereign character, was contained in the letters of James Madison to Thomas Jefferson of the 10th of March, 1787, to Gov. Randolph of the 8th of April, and to Gen. Washington of the 16th of April.

So the intellect of Madison—a powerful intellect in a frail body—just in advance of the meeting of the convention was busy formulating definite provisions which might aid in giving a fair start to its deliberations.

It is to him also that we are indebted for a report of the convention proceedings. The day of skillful stenographers had not come, and Madison, forecasting the strong desire which would arise to know what occurred in such an epoch-making assemblage, determined that he would be its reporter and thus supply the materials for a history of the convention, on which, as he believed, would be staked the happiness of a people, great even in its infancy, and possibly the cause of liberty throughout the world. In order to perform the task satisfactorily he took his seat immediately in front of the presiding officer, was not absent a single day, and testified that he was almost overcome by the double labor of listening to speeches and reporting them.

The Virginia deputies, when they reached Philadelphia, agreed that Gov. Randolph should present the Virginia plan, not to be binding on any of his colleagues, but which should, and, as the journal shows, did, become the basis on which the proceedings of the convention were conducted. Madison engaged in nearly all of the discussions, as did Randolph and Mason, and Washington spoke once relative to a matter which he considered of much importance, and when a conclusion was reached as to what the instrument should be Madison served on the committee of revision, which made the final draft.

The convention was comparatively small, only 56 members serving and only 41 signing. But, as universally agreed, never has there been a more notable gathering, and never at a given time in any country has the mind of man traveled so far in planning for the welfare of communities. Nor is there recorded any such shining instance of a body of statesmen of the first rank, representing the intellect, character, and ambition of an extensive country, of many States, having conflicting interests and diverse views, so completely surrendering their preconceptions and combining their compromises in a single document, providing a great political structure, different from any known before, and, notwithstanding, built upon the essential doctrines in defense of which the Revolution had been fought. [Applause.] In his biography of one of its framers, President Roosevelt [applause]—the valiant American whose death we so much deplore—praising the Constitution, described it as "not simply a compromise, but a bundle of compromises."

As none of those who signed the Constitution were entirely satisfied with it, some believing that it conferred excessive powers on the Federal Government, others believing that it would not prove sufficiently strong, and others objecting to specific provisions, none of them were confident that it would be ratified by a sufficient number of the more important States to render it a practical instrument of government. They recognized that while ratification by any nine States would give it a naked official status, dependence for anything substantial and lasting must be placed upon the action of the large and influential Commonwealths. They understood that its future was in a trembling and perilous balance, and its advocates looked forward to what the States might do with the utmost solicitude and misgiving. The opposition was more formidable in the pivotal States of Virginia and New York than elsewhere. Before the convention of either of these States met, eight States ratified. Virginia and New York had postponed, and the country waited anxiously for their action, persuaded that without these a government to replace the Confederation could not be secured. Had the action of Virginia been adverse, New York would hardly have ratified, and thus it is seen that in a large measure everything depended upon what Virginia might do. In both States there were men of weight who regarded any government as a necessary evil and who desired no government stronger than the Confederation. There were also those who, not entirely sharing that opinion, were dissatisfied with the Constitution as drafted and sought to bring about a second convention; and there were also those who insisted upon the instrument being amended before being ratified. The forces led and directed by Washington stood for unconditional approval. Hamilton, apprehensive of amendment, said:

It appears to me susceptible of complete demonstration that it will be far more easy to obtain subsequent than previous amendments to the Constitution. The moment alteration is made in the present plan it becomes, for the purpose of adoption, a new one and must undergo a new decision from each State.

Washington repeatedly wrote:

There is no alternative, no hope of an alternative, no intermediate resting place between the adoption of this Constitution and a recourse to an unqualified state of anarchy with all of its deplorable consequences.

On June 2, 1788, when the Virginia convention met in Richmond, the destiny of the country was in its keeping. The foes of the Constitution claimed and its friends feared that a majority of the people of the State were antagonistic. The State was stirred by controversy and excitement during the election of the delegates, and the interest was universal and intense when they came together. The 170 members included nearly all of the foremost men of the Commonwealth. The principal exceptions were Washington and Jefferson, the one at Mount Vernon with his hand upon the pulse of the country and the State, and the other in France, where he was kept posted by his friends, Madison and Mason, as to the contending currents of opinion. With the assistance of the historians, among them the distinguished Hugh Blair Grigsby, who many years ago compiled a full and delightful account of the convention, and Senator Beveridge, the author of a most admirable life of John Marshall, recently published, we look back upon the convention as on a picture of a great scene spread upon a great canvass. Lest a Virginian be thought to overstate, I will use the words of Senator Beveridge:

In Virginia's convention the array of ability, distinction, and character on both sides was notably brilliant and impressive. The strongest debaters in the land were there; the most powerful orators and some of the most scholarly statesmen. Seldom in any land or age has so gifted and accomplished a group of men contended in argument and discussion at one time and place.

From every part of the State the delegates were drawn and from every occupation. There were the older statesmen, and the younger public men then entering upon the course that was to take many of them into the higher stations of the Federal Government. There were men from the eastern section, where the drama of the revolution had slowly unfolded to its consummation; from the slopes and valleys of the Allegheny Mountains; from the frontier—the remote Kentucky district, made up of the six Virginia counties soon to be a great State. [Applause.] In the list of the delegates who voted for ratification were the Kentucklans, Marshall and Breckenridge. [Applause.]

Many of the delegates were men of finished education and culture. Some had been trained at Oxford and Cambridge, and in the law at the Middle Temple and the Inns of the Court; some had spent their student days in the halls of William and Mary College and other American institutions of learning; and there were those who had been denied any educational advantage except that afforded by the school of experience and exertion. According to their convictions, they were all resolute in the purpose to serve faithfully the country in the new crisis, precisely as many of them had served it before the Revolution in the patriotic movements of that time, and during the war on the battle fields where the States had tried out their strength with the mother country. I believe it may be said of them with as little reserve as of any body of men who ever seriously and deliberately considered the business of government that they divested themselves of self-seeking and were inspired by that most worth while of all public virtues—a spirit of readiness to make any sacrifice essential to the common good.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Virginia be extended 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Virginia be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I thank my friend from Iowa and the House.

The decisive votes were taken on June 25. The intervening time of a little more than three weeks was the full period of debate, during which, under a rule agreed upon at the outset, every article and almost every section of the Constitution, in the order of its arrangement, was made the matter of scrutiny and discussion. The opposition, representing, as it confidently proclaimed, a large majority of the people, was led by Patrick Henry, then at the height of his fame, although he was more than a decade from the historic hour when, in the House of Burgesses, regardless of danger and defying protest, he had carried through his resolution against taxation without representation by a majority of one. To this audience it is perhaps unnecessary to suggest that the conception of Henry as simply an orator is erroneous. He was a statesman who served in many offices, one of them the governorship, and to whom the position of United States Senator was offered. He was also a remarkable lawyer, whose practice, as his diary shows, extended to the courts of Boston, and who when Washington came to make up the Supreme Court, was offered the place of Chief Justice. Henry's fundamental objection to the Constitution was that it unduly centralized in the Federal Government powers which he thought should be retained by the States. On this theme in all its aspects and variations he spoke from day to day, and sometimes with such force and eloquence as to disconcert his opponents. At one stage in an elaborate speech he urged upon the Delegates, and particularly upon those from Kentucky, that the Congress contemplated by the Constitution might ignore the interests of the Southern States and abandon the navigation of the Mississippi River to the Spaniards, and Madison wrote Washington, with whom he was in constant correspondence, that he feared this argument might serve to prevent ratification. Similarly impressed, Gouverneur Morris, who was in Richmond to watch the proceedings of the convention, wrote Hamilton that matters were not going as well as the friends of America could wish.

When the subject of the judiciary was reached, Henry, having already inveighed against the powers vested in Congress and in the Executive, exclaimed:

The purse is gone; the sword is gone; and this is the only thing of importance that remains to us.

Supporting Henry was George Mason, of Gunston Hall, said to have been spoken of by Mr. Jefferson as the wisest man he ever knew, the author of the first constitution of a free Commonwealth, and of the Fairfax Resolves, and of the Bill of Rights, which embraced substantially all of the principles which were afterwards written in the Declaration of Independence. He served in the Philadelphia Convention, and declined to approve or sign the Constitution, but he was concerned to make it as good as possible from his point of view. Among those on the same side were James Monroe, who was to become the fifth President; Gov. Tyler, the father of President Tyler; and Gov. Harrison, the father of one President and the great-grandfather of another. Among those who supported ratification, under the leadership of James Madison, who was to be the fourth President, were Gov. Randolph; Edmund Pendleton, the venerable president of the State court of appeals; George Wythe, the renowned chancellor who, as a teacher of law, impressed himself upon the career of so many of the young men of Virginia, including Henry Clay; Light Horse Harry Lee, the father of the wonderful soldier and stainless gentleman who, in the troubled time nearer to our own, led the armies of the Confederacy [applause]; and John Marshall, who, having fought through the Revolution and taken position as one of the influential younger leaders, was, after a while, to be accounted perhaps the greatest judge our race has produced. These were some of those who participated in that short and never-to-be-forgotten encounter whose result has so tremendously affected the course of government in America and everywhere. No detail or analysis is possible, but I may be permitted to refer to one of the questions that was in controversy. In respect to the contention often urged that the Supreme Court usurps power in declaring an act of Congress unconstitutional, it is tolerably significant that in the Virginia convention those who feared that the authority of Congress would be improperly exercised doubted whether its activities could be supervised or checked by the Federal courts, and that John Marshall, to allay their fears, put forward the theory to which he adhered whenever the question was presented from the time of the decision in Marbury against Madison, saying in one of his speeches:

"If Congress should make a law not warranted by any of the powers enumerated, it would be condemned by the Federal judges as an infringement of the Constitution, which they are to guard. They would not consider such a law as coming under their jurisdiction; they would declare it void."

No vote was had in the convention until a motion to amend previous to ratification was presented. On this the ayes and noes were demanded by Henry and seconded by Bland, and the motion was defeated by a majority of eight. Immediately another vote was taken on the motion to ratify, on which Mason, seconded by Henry, moved the ayes and noes, and the result was 89 in favor of ratification and 79 against it. These very slender majorities settled the fate of the Constitution, and in a large degree the fate of the country. How great was the effect of the action of Virginia on that of New York is to be inferred from the circumstance that a little later the Constitution was ratified by the New York convention, although after its session began and before Virginia had reached a decision Hamilton, when asked the prospect, had replied, "God only knows; several votes have been taken by which it appears that they are two to one against it." Virginia and New York having acted, 11 States having ratified, the darkness was gone and the country stood in the full light of a new day. [Applause.]

I may refer again for a moment to some of the statesmen I have mentioned, because of their being identified with that part of Virginia whose vigorous and patriotic people I have the privilege of representing—the region which lies almost within the shadow of this Capitol and stretches from the Potomac to the blue range of mountains toward the west, a beautiful and fertile region, whose attractions captured the eager fancy of the early settlers as they made their way from tidewater to the interior. There in his tomb at Mount Vernon sleeps the master builder of the Republic, and there, near by, is the resting place of George Mason, his friend and coworker in the cause of liberty. There also lived James Madison, John Marshall, and James Monroe, the homes yet preserved that echoed to their voices. These we acclaim as among the very greatest founders of the Nation. So long as we are true to the memory of such men and faithful to the standards and ideals which they set for the guidance of a free people in a free land, in a noble sense they will remain—

> The dead but sceptered sovereigns who still rule
> Our spirits from their urns.

[Prolonged applause.]

REPORT ON LIQUOR INTERESTS AND GERMAN AND BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate concurrent resolution No. 4.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up Senate concurrent resolution No. 4, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 4.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed 10,000 copies of the hearings and report of the committee entitled "Brewing and Liquor Interests and German Propaganda and Bolshevik Propaganda," held before a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, in the second and third sessions of the Sixty-fifth Congress, pursuant to S. Res. 307 and 469, of which 3,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for the use of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

With a committee amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause of resolution and insert:

That there be printed 2,500 additional copies of Senate document No. 62, Sixty-sixth Congress, entitled "Brewing and Liquor Interests and German and Bolshevik Propaganda," of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 500 copies for the use of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Under what privileged status is this resolution now presented to the House? Is it taken from the Speaker's table or is it a report from the House Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. It is a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WALSH. And the amendments that have been read are the amendments of the House committee?

The SPEAKER. They are.

Mr. KIESS. I move the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Does the House committee propose to deny to the House of Representatives any copies of this additional print and are they all to be for the use of the Senate?

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, the Senate passed this resolution some time ago, calling for the printing of 10,000 copies, which would have entailed a cost of $17,441.87. The House committee felt that inasmuch as there had been practically no requests from the Members of the House for these documents and that this was a large sum of money to expend, we declined to report the resolution favorably at that time. The Senators, however, have been very insistent on having this resolution passed, especially the members of the Senate Judiciary Committee. The House committee has reduced the number to 2,500 and reduced the expense from $17,441.87 to $4,389.02, and provided that 2,000 copies should go to the Senate and 500 to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. For the information of Members of the House, I would say that the aditional cost per thousand is $1,783.33. I do not know of any request having been made, and I believe that the few Members who may desire copies can be supplied from the 2,000 that go to the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL of California. I appreciate the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Printing that it is advisable to reduce the expense, but it does seem to me that the Members of the House ought to have a few of these copies. I will say that I have myself had requests for more than 2,000 copies of this publication in the last few months. I am not getting very many requests now, but am getting some few, and other Members are getting requests. I suggest that the House ought to have a portion of those 2,500 copies, if the chairman of the committee thinks that would be proper.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I admit that this is a rather unusual procedure, but it was done entirely for the purpose of saving money, and as no Member of the House had mentioned the matter to the committee we felt justified in reporting the resolution in its present form.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I gather from the reading of the resolution that the expense is to be borne from the contingent funds of the two Houses.

Mr. KIESS. Yes. The gentleman will understand that it is necessary to pass this concurrent resolution because the cost will exceed the $500, which is the limit the House or Senate can print.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but why should the House pay half the expense of printing a document of which they are to have no copies to distribute? It seems to me that this resolution should provide that the expense of this printing for the Senate Judiciary Committee should be borne from the contingent fund of the Senate, and not be paid, half of it, out of the contingent fund of the House, particularly in view of the fact that the resolution as amended provides that this printing is to be for the use of the Senate Judiciary Committee only. It seems to me it is not wise to pass resolutions providing for the printing of documents of hearings held by Senate committees, to reduce the number, and then provide that the House shall pay half the expense, particularly when it costs $1,700 a thousand to print them. I trust the gentleman will withdraw the resolution in order that it may be amended in that way, or that he will offer such an amendment.

Mr. KIESS. We are very anxious to procure action on this, because of the insistence of the Senators who have held this hearing, and I will offer an amendment that 1,000 copies be for the use of the Senate and 1,000 copies for the use of the House.

Mr. WELLING. And 500 for the use of the Senate Judiciary Committee?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "2,000 copies" and insert in lieu thereof "1,000 copies," and after the word "Senate," insert the words "and 1,000 copies for the use of the House."

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. How do you propose to distribute these 1,000 copies to the Members of the House?

Mr. KIESS. They will go to the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks they will go to the folding room and be distributed under the rule, so that each Member will receive his proportionate share.

Mr. GARD. May we now have the resolution read as it will read when amended?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the resolution as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 2,500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 62, Sixty-sixth Congress, entitled "Brewing and Liquor Interests and German and Bolshevik Propaganda," of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,000 copies for the use of the House, and 500 copies for the use of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALSH. In order to have the language correct, it should be "1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives." The words "of Representatives" should be added.

Mr. KIESS. I move the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not the amendment have to be adopted first?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

PRODUCTION AND CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8624, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference, without instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8624, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. TREADWAY. Reserving the right to object, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to move to instruct the conferees to report the bill back with an amendment striking out the section added by the Senate known as the Ball rent-commission bill?

The SPEAKER. It would after the conference has been agreed to.

Mr. TREADWAY. A further inquiry. Can I amend the motion made by the gentleman from Iowa to send the bill to conference without instructions by a further motion to strike out the Ball amendment?

The SPEAKER. That is all done by unanimous consent.

Mr. TREADWAY. Personally, I must object to unanimous consent being granted with no instructions to the conferees as to that amendment. It has nothing to do with the bill being sent to conference, and in my opinion should not be a part of the bill. It should be dealt with on its merits before the House. The subject matter has never been acted on by the House. I shall feel obliged to object unless there is a motion to instruct the conferees to strike out the so-called Ball amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman will have that right after it is sent to conference.

Mr. TREADWAY. The motion of the gentleman from Iowa is to send it to conference without instructions. I desire to see that they are instructed.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, there are 11 amendments; one is this Ball amendment. My understanding is that it was drawn rather hurriedly. I have letters from Senators and others suggesting a number of changes. It was thought that it would be better to send it to conference and let the conferees give it due consideration.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. The point I am making is that the Committee on Agriculture, for whom we have the highest regard, would have under consideration the bill entitled "An act to provide further for the national credit and defense by encouraging the production and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel." That is the title of the bill in conference. The amendment that it seeks to add is entitled "To create a rent commission in the District of Columbia."

If there is any sense whatever in submitting an amendment in the form of a rider to a bill controlling the distribution of food and fuel, adding to that a rent commission for the District of Columbia, I should like to know what it is. It seems to me that it is entirely out of the province of the Committee on Agriculture to deal with the great question involving a rent commission in the District of Columbia. Therefore, unless I can make such a motion, I shall feel compelled to object to the request of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will not hold the Committee on Agriculture responsible for the action of the Senate?

Mr. TREADWAY. Of course not.

Mr. HAUGEN. A somewhat similar amendment was offered to the bill when being considered in Committee of the Whole, and was voted in, but was later voted out, when the bill was reported back to the House. The bill deals with profiteering, not in the District of Columbia alone but in the whole country as well. The Ball amendment is incorporated in a bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture and passed by the House. As far as I am concerned I have no objection to a vote being taken on that particular amendment, the Ball amendment. If it goes in at all, it should go to conference in order that it may be more carefully considered.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I have heard the gentleman send a number of bills to conference heretofore. Why has he asked to send this particular bill to conference without instructions?

Mr. HAUGEN. Because I understand that is the usual way to put the motion. Since the question was raised the other day it seems to me that this will avoid delay. The contention is that this bill should go to conference. If we are going to spend the whole day deciding whether it shall go to conference or not, it will delay its consideration.

Mr. WALSH. I suppose the Committee on Rules is still functioning?

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know about the recent developments that the gentleman mentions, but do I understand that after the conferees have been appointed they can then be instructed?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not under my motion, but I am willing to modify it.

Mr. TREADWAY. I shall object to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify the motion so that we may vote on the question as to whether the Ball amendment goes in the bill or goes out.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am entirely agreeable to that procedure.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Is it the gentleman's intention to give a reasonable debate upon this matter?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has asked for time, and it is understood that he shall have 40 minutes, and then 5 minutes on this side. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the time be fixed at 50 minutes; that 40 minutes be given to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not want to monopolize all the time.

Mr. HAUGEN. We have up for consideration to-day the deficiency bill; gentlemen in charge of it desire us to dispose of this bill within the hour. If any length of time is desired for debate we will have to postpone action or refer to the committee. We thought that in view of the importance of early passage of the bill it should be sent to conference rathen than to the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Do I understand that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is now trying to send this bill to conference without instructions and to agree that any debate on a motion to instruct the conferees shall not exceed 40 or 45 minutes?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the last motion of the gentleman from Iowa. The Chair did not hear it.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, if a motion is made to instruct the conferees they can not tie up debate upon that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is not stating a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Iowa revise his request for unanimous consent in accordance with what I understood him to say a few moments ago, namely, that he was willing to have the Ball bill voted up or down, as to whether it shall be agreed to as an amendment to this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the last request of the gentleman from Iowa and will ask the gentleman to repeat it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, my last request was that the bill be taken from the Speaker's table, that all amendments be disagreed to, that a conference be asked for, and that one motion be in order; that is, to instruct the conferees to strike out the Ball amendment. There are 11 amendments. If we are going to discuss the bill, I can not in honor agree to an extended debate, because the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has yielded time in which to consider this matter. If objection is to be made, then let the bill take its regular course; let it be sent to the committee, which action may delay it for a week or two. Gentlemen, you have the responsibility.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is stating the case in rather an exaggerated manner when he says we will have the responsibility. We are willing to have the responsibility, but the Ball bill has never been considered by this body. Therefore, I say we must debate it. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] has stated how important this measure is. It is important; but if this Agricultural bill is important let him strike out the Ball bill as an amendment to that and take it up on its own merits.

Mr. HAUGEN. I am willing to have an expression from the House. I would be very glad to have it.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am trying to get an expression from the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will indicate the time desired, I will confer with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], and if he agrees to an extension of time then I will be glad to yield, but under the agreement I have with the gentleman from Iowa I must make my word good, and I am not going to agree to any lengthy discussion which would deprive him of the right to go on with his deficiency bill.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman has suggested that we have a certain length of time—40 or 50 minutes—and in making this suggestion he states that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] wants 45 minutes and the gentleman from Massachusetts wants some time.

Mr. HAUGEN. Ten minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. Both of those gentlemen are opposed to the Ball bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, I beg to differ with the gentleman, in a sense.

Mr. RUBEY. At least, the gentlemen are opposed to putting this Ball bill on this Agricultural bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. And the point I want to make is that it is unfair to those of the House who are in favor of this legislation to be confined in debating it to 5 or 10 minutes when gentlemen who are opposing it have 40 or 50 minutes. If you are going to discuss the Ball bill, the time should be divided equally between those who are for it and those who are against it.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify my request, that one hour and a half be given to debate, 45 minutes to be allotted to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] and 45 minutes to myself, with the understanding that 45 minutes be for and 45 minutes against the amendment.

Mr. TREADWAY. And it is understood that a motion is in order to strike out the Ball bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the request is not in order until it is decided whether we are going to send this measure to conference. The gentleman is trying to control the time of debate on the question of instructions. We may agree on time for debate on the motion to instruct and find that somebody will not agree to send it to conferenee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumes from the attitude of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] that he does not wish the matter sent to conference unless a limit can be put upon debate, and the Chair thinks there can be a request that the bill be sent to conference and also a request limiting debate, but it all depends whether there is objection made to it. The Chair will state, as he understands it, the request of the gentleman from Iowa, which is that this bill be taken from the Speaker's table, that all amendments be disagreed to, that it be sent to conference with the understanding that on one motion there shall be one hour and a half debate, 45 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] and 45 minutes by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the request has not yet been stated by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may be mistaken in his statement. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Iowa to again state his request.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, my request is to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 8624, disagree to all amendments thereto, and ask for a conference; that one amendment be in order, that is to strike out the Ball amendment——

Mr. DOWELL. To instruct.

Mr. HAUGEN. And that one hour and a half debate be granted, half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] and the other half by myself, with the understanding that half of the time is for and half of the time against the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. From the latter part of the gentleman's request I assume when he says one amendment shall be in order that he means one motion to instruct the conferees will be in order on the matter of the Ball amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH. And upon that there shall be one hour and a half debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is the intention.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

Mr. WALSH. I think it should be so stated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state it again. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, to disagree to all Senate amendments, and ask for a conference, and that there shall be allowed one motion to instruct, which will be to agree or disagree to the Ball amendment, and upon that motion there shall be debate of an hour and a half, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa and one-half by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE]. Is there objection?

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks for the regular order. Either objection must be made or not. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9205.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9205, the first deficiency appropriation bill, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9205, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee arose yesterday there were no amendments pending, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rock Island (Ill.) Arsenal: The remaining unexpended balances, not to exceed $450,000, of the appropriation of $2,965,000 for increasing the facilities for the manufacture of field artillery matériel, including the necessary buildings and equipment, and for providing additional storage space and other storage facilities, either by building and equipping new storehouses or by building and equipping shops for manufacturing purposes and equipping as storehouses shops thereby vacated and made available (act of June 12, 1917) and of the appropriation of $1,295,200 additional for increasing facilities for the manufacture of field artillery matériel, including the necessary buildings and equipment (act of Oct. 6, 1917), are made available for the erection of a shop building for the manufacture of recuperators at Rock Island Arsenal: Provided, That this sum shall not be available until the present plant for the manufacture of recuperators is disposed of.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what kind of war matériel recuperators are—found in line 10, page 11?

Mr. GOOD. When we got into the war we had a very limited amount of field artillery. The War Department finally adopted the French model of field artillery, the 155-millimeter guns and howitzers, to be the principal gun, or rather the gun of which most were to be manufactured. The French recuperator, which is the recoil mechanism of the gun, was one of the most delicate pieces of machinery that the Government had to manufacture. We were no accustomed to manufacturing those recuperators, and it was stated by French officers that we would never be able to manufacture them. But we did undertake to manufacture them, and while we did not get any guns equipped with those recuperators in time to send them over before the armistice was signed, the testimony before the committee is that we were manufacturing those recuperators at the time the armistice was signed with as much perfection as they were manufactured in the arsenals in France. This factory that is referred to is located on the grounds of the Dodge Manufacturing Co., and that company have now agreed to buy the building at 40 per cent of its cost. The building is not suitable, as I understand it, for their manufacture, and they are willing to buy a good deal of the machinery for which the Government has no use, and there is a prospect of selling for $600,000 additional machinery that is not needed. So that by carrying this legislation we will obviate the necessity of paying a considerable sum, I do not know how much, but a considerable sum, as much as $125,000, for the land, and we are now under a yearly charge of about $40,000 for maintenance, including guarding the property, and it is the purpose to move the machinery that it is desired to retain to Rock Island, where a building will be put up and where no further charge will be made for guarding. They have the guards there.

Mr. KNUTSON. The plant is not located at the Rock Island Arsenal, then?

Mr. GOOD. No; the plant is at the Dodge Brothers' plant at Detroit.

Mr. KNUTSON. It came under the head of the Rock Island Arsenal, which was the occasion for the inquiry. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The importance of this item has been referred to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], and he has stated very briefly the facts that make necessary this legislation. As is well known, at the outbreak of the war we had so little artillery, so few guns, that it was considered wiser to not attempt to increase our supply of the types we had, but to adopt the French models instead. In fact, there were so few guns that there was not as much as a battery for each camp to use for the training of soldiers in the use of artillery. Therefore we adopted for our use not only the 155 mm. howitzer and 155 mm. gun, as indicated by the gentleman from Iowa, but also the famous French 75. We had never manufactured that gun. It had a secret recoil mechanism, the recuperator, as it is called, known only to certain ordnance officers of the French Government. When we came into the war the French Government gave us access to the secret of this wonderful mechanism and invited us to make it. We undertook to make it and had considerable difficulty in doing so. In fact, we failed for many months to make an American model that would work satisfactorily. The recuperator as developed by the French is a very delicate piece of mechanism. It is necessary for certain parts of it to be dust proof and damp proof. In France much of the work on it is handwork. We tried to substitute American methods but with indifferent success.

Finally, as stated by the gentleman from Iowa, we learned to make it in the French way, and it is not boasting to say that we learned to make it just as well as the French made it. We did not make it in our own arsenals, because we had no arsenal equipped for the purpose. So we went outside, and the plant referred to by the gentleman from Iowa was selected as one of the very best places in which to make this mechanism, and there it was successfully made. The machinery for making it is there, and the equipment is also there. The purpose now is to utilize this machinery and equipment. It is the intention of this legislation to provide for securing this machinery and this equipment and turn it to the use of making recuperators for ourselves as we may need them. It is clearly for the best interest of the Military Establishment and the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PANAMA CANAL.

For civil government of the Panama Canal and Canal Zone: Salaries of district judge $7,500, district attorney $5,000, marshal $5,000, and for gratuities and necessary clothing for indigent discharged prisoners $150,000, to continue available until expended: Provided, That the additional compensation, authorized by section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1920, shall not be included in determining the compensation of any employee of the Panama Canal on the Canal Zone.

Mr. DOWELL and Mr. KNUTSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] is recognized.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order against the proviso beginning on line 14 and running to the end of the section. It is new legislation, changing the law, and therefore subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], the chairman of the committee, desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GOOD. I think it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TILSON. Further reserving the point of order against the phrase "to continue available until expended," I desire, under the reservation, to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the purpose of making this item "to continue available until expended," when the sundry civil bill will be coming in before very long and deficiency bills are often before the House? Why is it important to make this item available until expended?

Mr. GOOD. That has always been the case with regard to appropriations for the Panama Canal and the civil government. And a very good reason exists for establishing that custom or carrying that provision of law. The Panama Canal has certain receipts that are available for expenditure, and therefore, taking the whole thing into consideration, it was thought that better administration would result if they could at the end of each year make a general statement, which they do, and that the appropriations should remain available until expended. And that is the general method of carrying the item. Of course, it is subject to a point of order, but it might result in a good deal of hardship if we attempted to change in the midst of a year the system of accounting and keeping the books of the appropriation.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, on the statement of the gentleman from Iowa I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut withdraws the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $9,300,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended upon repairs to any vessel which is not to be retained permanently in the Navy: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall submit to Congress not later than February 1, 1920, a statement showing for each navy yard and naval station the total number of employees, by occupations, on December 31, 1919, and the proportion of such employees who are below a fair standard of efficiency.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the whole paragraph. It is legislation.

Mr. KRAUS. If the point is made, I do not desire to offer the amendment. I take it the paragraph is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana seeks to offer an amendment, and the gentleman from Minnesota, having reserved a point of order——

Mr. KNUTSON. I will reserve the point pending the consideration of it.

The CHAIRMAN. That can not be done.

Mr. KNUTSON. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order? The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNUTSON. That it is legislation.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman only makes his point of order now as to the last paragraph, which is the proviso. I doubt if a point of order would lie from line 9 down to line 16. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order in regard to this item, because that is the provision where we are calling for a showing.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is the point of order against the whole paragraph or against part of it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Minnesota to make a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. KNUTSON. I desire to make a point of order on the paragraph down to line 8, page 13.

Mr. GOOD. We have passed that. It is too late.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUTLER. Where does the paragraph begin and where does it end?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state for the benefit of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the paragraph begins on line 9, page 13, with the words "in all" and ends with the words "of efficiency," in line 16.

Mr. BUTLER. I earnestly hope the gentleman will not press his point of order.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOWELL. Is not the phrase "in all, $9,300,000," a part of the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the Chair will permit, I desire to call attention to the fact that it is only separated by a semicolon and not by a period.

Mr. DOWELL. This seems to be a part of the succeeding paragraph. As I read it, I would take it that the entire preceding part is a part of this main paragraph.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota withdraws the point of order. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KRAUS: Page 13, line 16, after the word "efficiency," change comma to colon and insert:

"Provided further, That the following unexpended balances of appropriations for the support of the Naval Establishment for the fiscal year 1920, as hereinafter set forth, shall be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury immediately upon the approval of this act, namely, Bureau of Navigation, 'Pay of the Navy,' $6,700,000; 'Provisions, Navy,' $2,000,000; total appropriations recovered, Bureau of Navigation, $8,700,000."

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to take up the time of the House if the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the testimony and the letter of Secretary Roosevelt show that the total sum of $18,000,000, part of which was appropriated for the pay of the Navy, $4,000,000 for provisions, Navy, is entirely unnecessary and can not be expended.

Now, in these days when we are practicing economy, and when we are requiring the Treasury to finance enormous appropriations, it is certainly the part of wisdom to withdraw at the very earliest moment possible any amount heretofore appropriated that can be withdrawn without detriment to the service; and there is no question, if anyone will read the hearings on this branch of the bill, that the department asserts and admits that $18,000,000 can be spared from these appropriations. As a matter of fact, this legislative provision is a mere transfer of $9,300,000 of that $18,000,000, and at this time I am asking that this committee approve this amendment, which will cover into the Treasury the sum of $8,700,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is not drawn in the proper form. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS] is mistaken in regard to the bureau. As I heard the amendment read, it referred to the Bureau of Navigation. These appropriations are carried under the head of Bureau of Supplies and Accounts. We realized that there would be a surplus there, but the year is so young and so many things might happen that it might be necessary in the future to do what we have done here in this bill by permitting a transfer of funds. I doubt the wisdom of covering anything into the Treasury just now. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that we are all anxious, of course, that not a dollar shall be paid out that can be saved; but if there is any place in the Navy where they can not squander money, it is in the payment of the men, because they can not pay that money out for any purpose other than to compensate the men, and the men are not enlisted. The amount of the expenditure depends upon the personnel of the Navy. If the personnel is small, as it is now, the expenditures are small, and the money will necessarily have to be covered back.

But I will say to the gentleman that since this matter came up there has been a matter presented, but too late to come before the committee, asking that a million dollars of this fund be made available for the purpose of permitting the Navy to bring coal out of Alaska. They say that they have not a dollar now that can be used for that purpose, and they are anxious that some of this money shall be transferred for that purpose. While ordinarily I think that money should be covered into the Treasury as rapidly as possible—and I have not very much of an opinion about this—it seems to me it might be as well to let the matter go over until a little later in the year.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. KRAUS. On that theory, why not make enormous appropriations, knowing that the bureaus can not spend the money, while at the same time, as the gentleman must concede, we are compelling the Treasury to finance excessive appropriations?

Mr. GOOD. This money can not be paid out, and money appropriated for this purpose can not be used except for the payment of the men. It can not be used for building purposes or repair purposes.

Mr. KRAUS. But that does not relieve the Treasury from the necessity of selling bonds or procuring funds in some other way to meet increased expenditures.

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to modify my motion by substituting "Supplies and Accounts" instead of the word "Navigation" where it occurs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KRAUS: Page 13, line 16, after the word "efficiency," change comma to colon and insert:

"Provided further, That the following unexpended balances of appropriations for the support of the Naval Establishment for the fiscal year 1920, as hereinafter set forth, shall be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury immediately upon the approval of this act, namely: Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, 'Pay of the Navy': $6,700,000; 'Provisions, Navy'; $2,000,000; total appropriations recovered, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, $8,700,000."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be hazardous to pass that amendment. We do not know how many men we will have between now and the 30th day of June. This appropriation is for the pay of the men, and I think it would be very hazardous to cut down the appropriation $8,000,000. The ships are tied up, and we are short of men now, and we are putting forth every effort to get men. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I am going to ask my esteemed colleague [Mr. KRAUS] on the committee not to press his amendment. I agree with him that we ought to try to save money, and we are trying to save money. But we have already taken $9,000,000 out of this fund, and I do not know what the Secretary of the Navy will say about it when he returns home. I do not think he knows anything about it. It was done without his knowledge or consent. If the point of order had been made at the right place, it would have gone out. Nevertheless they need for this purpose some of this money to be taken from the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and I would be afraid, my friends, to reduce it any further. I would be afraid it might interfere with the force. I promise I will join in the attempt to save money and return it to the Treasury when opportunity offers. The gentleman from Indiana, however, is right when he says that the officers of the Government will have to finance the Treasury according to the appropriations that are made. And although this money may not be used, they have got to raise the $9,000,000. I would be afraid to cut this down any more. The gentleman is right, if we could be sure about it.

Mr. KRAUS. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania aware of the fact that the testimony shows that the personnel of the Navy will be down to 115,000 by the 1st of December?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. KRAUS. While our appropriation takes care of 170,000. This appropriation is much in excess of the amount that is required.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend is entirely right; but the enlistments may start up in the spring of the year, and before the end of the year we may have the men in the service. It is true it looks as though we would have this fund left over, but we may not.

Mr. KRAUS. Does not the gentleman know that even if we recruit the Navy up to 170,000 by the 1st of December and keep it up to that figure until the 1st of next July, even if we reduce this amount we will still have ample funds to pay these two items, and, as a matter of fact, there is no justification to-day for giving them a single dollar of this money.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman has given me information that I did not have. I did not understand that this surplus would exist over and above the pay of the 170,000 men. I thought it would require this amount of money to pay the 170,000 who were authorized to be enlisted up to the 1st of next July.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman will recall that in making the appropriation originally we cut it $8,000,000 under the estimated amount.

Mr. BUTLER. I know we did.

Mr. PADGETT. We considered that $8,000,000 as an amount that, perhaps, would not be used in the shifting of the recruiting and demobilizing; but to take out an additional $8,000,000 in addition to the $9,000,000 transferable to other appropriations would be hazardous. We made an allowance of $8,000,000 in the original report of the bill, and I think we had better not make this further reduction.

Mr. BUTLER. I appreciate as well as anybody in the House, and perhaps better—because I think I know him better—the efforts made by my friend from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS]. I know he is absolutely sincere, and I do not like in any way to protest against his effort to save money. It is a laudable effort which the House ought to approve, and were it entirely safe I would be for it, and would ask everybody in the House to vote for it; but I fear that the proposition of the gentleman might in some way interfere with the recruiting and our effort to obtain men for the Navy next year. I dislike very much to oppose the gentleman, but that is my sincere belief.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. On the top of page 13 is an item—

"Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks," $2,500,000.

Will the chairman of the committee tell me what that $2,500,000 is to be used for? When the committee had before them the question of yards and docks we went into the subject very closely, and we awarded to the Bureau of Yards and Docks all the money we thought it was necessary for them to use in this fiscal year. I see that by this bill they are getting $2,500,000 more, above what we gave them in the appropriation.

Mr. GOOD. The committee went into that matter very carefully, and it was the opinion of the officers, as well as of the Assistant Secretary, that if any cut was made it should be a percentage cut, every item in the same proportion; that is, if we only gave them one-half of the $18,600,000 which they asked for, or $9,300,000, we should cut each of the items 50 per cent. Now, so far as the item of "Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks," is concerned, their revised estimate was for $12,500,000, and the current naval act carried $7,500,000. We went into that matter pretty carefully, as to what this maintenance item is. As I recall, it was the maintenance of those things at the yards and at the docks that properly fall within the operation of the yards and docks to maintain them; and maintenance, as I recall the term, does not have the signification of repair, but it is to maintain in operation. It is for the replacing of the wearing out and the rusting out, and the parts that become obsolescent, like the power plant——

Mr. BROWNING. They wanted a new power plant in almost every yard, and we cut them out; and while I shall not oppose it, I call attention to it.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to refresh and revise the recollection of my friend from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING]. We did mighty well, and I congratulate ourselves on keeping these items down to a certain point, and I want to congratulate this committee on having done equally well, too. I want to ask the Committee on Appropriations to file with the Naval Affairs Committee the statements that were made before the Committee on Appropriations, because we will remember all these things when the time comes, and next winter they will be deducted all right. If they get the money now, they will not get it then.

Mr. FESS. Good for you. I hope you will stick to that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand, they did not get enough from the Naval Affairs Committee to equal the amount that they wanted, and then, when they did not get it from the Naval Affairs Committee, they went to the Committee on Appropriations, and under the guise of maintenance, when it looked as if we were going to lose some Government property if it is not properly cared for, they got an additional allowance on that account.

Mr. BUTLER. No; it is not for that.

Mr. GOOD. This is not maintenance of that kind.

Mr. BROWNING. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is just the same; it is an additional appropriation transferred from another appropriation.

Mr. GOOD. The word "maintenance" is not used in that sense. This is to maintain a power plant and an electric-light plant as distinct from keeping them in repair.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is just what I am saying. The whole thing is an imposition on the House. The House thinks on the first blush that it is to preserve Government property, while, as a matter of fact, it is to carry on more extensive operations.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I feel inclined to support the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS] in his amendment. It is admitted that the money could not be used for the pay of sailors during the next year and that there will be something like a sum of $10,000,000 in excess of what can be expended for that purpose. Ten million dollars already appropriated furnishes a great temptation, as exemplified in this bill, where the Navy Department has come to the Committee on Appropriations and asked the committee to transfer from the items of "pay" and "provisions" to other items where it can be spent. As long as the money remains in the item of "pay" it is safe. Unless the Navy has the men the disbursing officers can not spend a dollar of it. But with a large amount like this, a large, juicy item of $10,000,000 already appropriated and suspended in plain sight, there is great temptation to come to the committee and ask that it be transferred to other items, where it can be and will be expended.

Mr. KRAUS. As a matter of fact, the chairman of the committee has already stated that they have asked for a transfer of another $100,000 out of the $10,000,000.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman's statement bears out what I said. It seems to me that sort of a thing ought to be discouraged.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The gentleman says that there are $10,000,000 that are not to be used.

Mr. TILSON. Eighteen million six hundred thousand for these two items. This bill calls for a transfer of half of that amount to other items, and that leaves in the items of "pay" and "provisions" $9,300,000.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. But suppose it becomes necessary to use $5,000,000 of this money?

Mr. TILSON. It can not be used for any other purpose than that for which it is appropriated, which is pay for the Navy and provisions.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. But suppose the Navy was recruited up where you wanted $5,000,000, where would you get the relief?

Mr. TILSON. If the Navy was recruited up to that number we might need a part of the sum.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. If it is not available, where could you get relief?

Mr. TILSON. In a subsequent deficiency bill.

Mr. GOOD. Assistant Secretary Roosevelt says that they will not need this $18,900,000. I think there will be no embarrassment, as far as that is concerned, if it should be covered into the Treasury if it was so desired.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. The Naval Committee appropriated more money than was needed in this particular department.

Mr. BROWNING. Oh, no; the gentleman is wrong. We appropriated what we thought would be needed, but the recruiting has not come up to the expectations.

Mr. DOWELL. But just the same, the committee appropriated more than is needed, and now the Navy wants to use it somewhere else.

Mr. TILSON. Evidently the officials of that department have expressed a desire to have it transferred to other accounts in which they can expend it.

Mr. GOOD. During the last quarter they can not under any circumstances, unless there is a change in the law, recruit more than 170,000 men. So I do not see how there can be any embarrassment, as far as that part is concerned.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. It seems to me that the House ought not to adopt an amendment of this sort, at least until we have some information from the Navy Department as to whether or not it can be done without serious embarrassment to that department. We did have some hearings, and Assistant Secretary Roosevelt did say that $18,600,000 could be transferred for certain specific purposes. The committee finally decided to recommend that half of it be transferred. But now to come here with an amendment covering in this sum offered on the floor, without consulting the naval officials as to whether it is wise to do it, or whether or not it can be done without embarrassing the Navy Department, seems to me to be unwise. The money will remain in the Treasury whether it is covered in or not, as the gentleman from Iowa has stated. Unless they have the enlisted men to pay the money will not be paid out, and therefore the United States Treasury can not lose anything if the amendment is not carried, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted, especially since we have no information from the Navy Department.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman, if the committee had approved of the request of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy to transfer the $18,600,000 which the Secretary stated he could not use for the purpose appropriated, you would not have embarrassed the Navy.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think we would have run a chance of doing it.

Mr. KRAUS. The only reason why you did not transfer the $18,600,000, you were afraid to embarrass another part of the Navy.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not say that. The Assistant Secretary, Admiral Benson, and others came before the committee and said that it was exceedingly important that those ships which are to remain permanently in the Navy and are now in the navy yards should be repaired, and that he felt that these sums could be properly transferred for that purpose. Their original idea was that an appropriation should be made directly for this purpose. But when they found that was impossible, they said that the seriousness of the situation was such that they were willing to concede that the amount named could be transferred.

The Naval Committee originally considered this matter and, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] states, cut this appropriation down $8,000,000, and now in the face of what the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. BUTLER] has said, backed up by what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], the ranking member on that committee, says, and in the face of the fact that the Navy Department has not been consulted about the covering in of this money to the Treasury, for the House to adopt this amendment, it seems to me, would be exceedingly hazardous, and I hope that it will not be done.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that I did not fully understand the situation with reference to this item of transfer at the time it was passed over. Otherwise I would have at least made a motion to reduce it, if not to strike it out entirely. The situation appears to be this: The Naval Committee went over this matter very carefully, and on part of the items at least allowed the Navy Department every nickel they thought they ought to have. Then the Navy Department subsequently finding it had some surplus in the matter of pay goes around to the Committee on Appropriations and succeeds in getting the sum that the Naval Committee would not allow them. This situation is the more peculiar because at this time our greatest competitor, the only nation that has a larger navy than ours, is laying aside almost one-half of its ships, has actually agreed to scrap 150 of them, and has suspended entirely the construction on her major ships and has very much decreased the work on other ships.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is stating something that I should like to listen to, but I am afraid that some one has been giving him wrong information about the Englishmen having dispensed with the construction on large ships. We get quite the contrary information in the Naval Committee.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The statement was made in the daily papers just the other day.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope it is true, but we get information just the other way.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I suppose the gentleman is aware that there is very much complaint in England about the unnecessary amounts that were expended upon the navy?

Mr. BUTLER. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And in view of this complaint, action has been taken by the English Admiralty toward cutting down expenses. Of course, the largest cut that has been made is in the matter of dirigible flying machines, where the cuts have been tremendous, but the daily newspapers have carried the statement that they have suspended the work on their major ships for the present. I am inclined to think the statement is correct. I know, of course, that we can always hear from the Navy Department about what great preparations are being made for war and what extensive additions are being made to the navies of other nations, but I have no reason to doubt this statement. In any event, so large a sum ought not to have been allowed the Navy Department for items that had been passed upon by the Naval Committee, and the least that we can do now is to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS] and put these unexpended balances where there will not be any temptation on the part of the Navy Department to expend them. Here is this great amount of over $9,000,000 that has not been spent, and if there is ever any money appropriated that a department has not spent, it seems that the department officials feel rather bad about it. They are always in here as soon as possible finding some other way to spend it. They can always find a way to do it and to impress the necessity for it upon the committees. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana ought to be adopted.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS], who is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, ought to be adopted, and the argument for its adoption appears more clearly perhaps from the statements made by those who are opposing than by those favoring the amendment. It is claimed that the Assistant Secretary of the Navy wanted over $18,000,000 for these purposes; that he first asked for an original appropriation for that amount. He was willing to cut it in two, and asked for an original appropriation. Then it is stated when he found that could not be done, that he was willing that all of the funds should be transferred. Thereupon, because of this argument, there was placed in this bill an appropriation amounting to $9,300,000. It is clear from all of the statements that have been made that there is no possible chance of this money being used for the purpose for which it was originally appropriated by this House. This is a golden opportunity when the House can again cover into the Treasury of the United States money which it has appropriated and which will not be used for that purpose. If there shall ever be a need created for additional appropriations to pay for the personnel, there will be no difficulty in getting it. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana ought to be adopted so as to remove all temptation from the Committee on Appropriations to take that fund and appropriate it for any other purpose, because if those other purposes are so worthy as to appeal to the committee, they will then make an original appropriation.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations met a serious question in determining what to do with regard to this estimate for repair of ships in the Navy, for that is practically what was desired to be accomplished. At first it was the thought of the committee, and I am frank to say that thought still lingers in our minds to some extent, that this provision was to take care of some of the men in the various yards who will have to be discharged, and on that theory the committee was unanimous that nothing should be allowed. But Admiral Benson and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy came before us and told us of the condition that many of the ships are in—so much worse condition than they had anticipated or had reason to expect when the estimates were made, in worse condition than they had advised the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the necessity was strong for putting some of these vessels in repair immediately, or as soon as possible, for it is stated that in their present condition deterioration would go on much more rapidly than if they were placed in repair.

The committee did not want to take the responsibility of having a great many battleships tied up because of a lack of funds for repairs. The committee would not act upon this question without going to the committee that is composed of experts on the subject, and so called in the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs. This provision would not have been put in the bill at all if it had not been with the consent and even the advice of that committee, because we recognized what we reported out was in the nature of a supplemental appropriation rather than a deficiency appropriation, but when the members of that committee said they did not want to take the responsibility of denying this fund for fear the Navy might be needed for some reason or other and if needed many of the vessels tied up because we had not appropriated the money, it seemed to us we could not take that responsibility. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] and other members of the committee—the gentleman from Tennessee—were freely consulted, and I am frank to say we not only followed their advice, but all the information which the committee received will be gladly turned over to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I was agreeable to this appropriation when the gentleman suggested the proviso should be added. I never would have agreed to it had it not been—that is, I would not have advised the committee to have reported the appropriation if it had not contained the proviso that no part of this fund shall be expended upon repairs to any vessel which is not to be retained permanently in the Navy.

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely. With that placed in there, not a dollar of this fund shall be expended on ships that are to be sold as junk. We put in another proviso that the Secretary of the Navy shall report the number of men employed in each yard and station and the number of such men who are below a fair standard of efficiency. It is to be regretted that the efficiency of the men in the navy yards has fallen 35 per cent since 1914. Only 65 per cent efficient is the testimony of the officers who have charge of these yards, and some yards ought to be closed. [Applause.] Some yards ought not to be permitted to run at all, because some yards are so inefficient to-day that there is no reason why they should be continued to exist with the low standard of efficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, speaking of efficiency I would like to call to the attention of the committee the trouble that is being experienced by discharged naval service men in collecting the additional one and a half cents a mile voted them by Congress last February. A number of cases have been called to my attention where boys put in claims for additional mileage last April, May, and June, and these claims have not been disposed of yet. Their discharges were sent in with the claim at the time, and I suggest that the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department investigate this particular phase and see if it is not possible to get a little action from some of the bureaus down at the other end of the Avenue. I yield back whatever of my time may remain.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE] is recognized for two and a half minutes.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say for the men employed in the Brooklyn Navy Yard that the efficiency there has been maintained at as high a standard as at any private shipyard in the locality. As a matter of fact when the twin hospital ships, the Comfort and Mercy, of the War Department were to be repaired, one was sent to the Brooklyn Navy Yard and one to a private concern for repair and overhauling, and the total cost for overhauling paid at the Brooklyn Navy Yard was about one-half the amount that it cost the Government at the private yard. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but some people say they will not vote money simply to keep men in a job. Of course none of us will vote money only to keep men in useless jobs. But it is a fact that England granted 13 weeks' pay to all men and women who were employed in munition factories in order that they might adjust themselves to conditions after the war. I am not advocating and I am not asking Congress to vote money to keep men in employment without regard to the need for those men. But I do say we ought not to curtail and cut down the money necessary to run the navy yards so that the lay off will be great and sudden and these men thrown into the world without occupation or place to get occupation, especially when ships in fact need repairs. And I submit that for the present this limited appropriation is justified.

The CHAIRMAN. The tire of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for two minutes on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes, exclusive of the time fixed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I know that all members of the Committee on Naval Affairs realized last spring the urgent necessity of cutting down appropriations wherever it was possible, and when the estimates came before our committee from the various bureaus of the department, in order to practice rigid economy we cut down practically every item that was submitted to us. When our bill was reported to this Congress it contained only such items which we thought absolutely necessary for the peace maintenance of the Navy. After that it developed that there were certain items that the department had not correctly estimated. We are now confronted with the fact that owing to decrease in the personnel all the money appropriated is unnecessary, but, on the other hand, we are confronted with the positive fact that unless we do provide money for certain repairs and maintenance of ships those ships will deteriorate in value. I desire to pay my respects to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for the able way in which he has presented the subject this afternoon. Some members of the Committee on Appropriations asked my own opinion about it, and in my humble way I said I felt that $18,600,000 additional asked for by the department was not justified, but when the money comes by transfer, without taking one dollar from the taxpayers of the country in addition to the amounts appropriated, and placing it where that money is absolutely needed for the upkeep and maintenance of our Navy, where every patriotic American wants it to be, I feel that every dollar asked for in this bill should be granted, and I therefore oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, all time has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. KRAUS. Division, Mr. Chairman. I withdraw that demand.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for a division, then.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 33.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For maintaining registers of teachers and assisting officers of education in finding teachers for positions requiring special qualifications, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $5,000.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. TOWNER. In line 6, strike out the figures "5,000" and insert "20,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TOWNER: Page 14, line 6, strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$20,000."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to ask that any item in this bill be increased. However, I think there is entire justification for asking this small increase of this small appropriation. The appropriation that has hitherto been made for the support of this branch of the Bureau of Education has been $40,000, and the estimate made by the bureau for the continuance of this work was $40,000. It has been reduced to the sum of $5,000, which practically makes it impossible for the bureau to carry on this work.

Let me state very briefly the nature of the work and give an idea, if I may, of its great importance. Of course, we understand that there is a part of the educational work of the country which is national in its scope. And, by the way, let me say that it is nothing less than a crisis that confronts the Nation to-day with regard to its schools and colleges in the securement of teachers. So many of the teachers have been called to other service during the war, both in the field and in civil life, who are not returning, that there are literally tens of thousands of schools in the United States to-day unable to secure teachers. This work of the Bureau of Education in the placing of teachers, most of it, is interstate or national in its scope. For instance, a college desires a professor of chemistry or some other teacher in one of the departments. He can not be secured in the neighborhood or even in the State. It has been the work of this bureau to keep on hand schedules of the available material for teachers in the universities and schools of the land. It has been necessary, of course, to secure from them, in the form of questionnaires, a statement of the fact that they are available for places, and then applications are made to the Bureau of Education for these places by these schools and colleges and universities of the country. This work has been of very great importance. It is now more than ever of great importance.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. During the régime of the Employment Bureau of the Department of Labor, as my information goes, they also had quite a force of employees engaged in securing positions for teachers, and a few other departments of the Government were apparently fulfilling the same function. Is that correct?

Mr. TOWNER. They were working in harmony with each other and supplementing the work of each other. The bureau of the Department of Labor was established as a part of their employment agencies in various sections of the United States to secure positions for teachers. They took care in large measure of the neighborhood or surrounding territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNER. And that work, I will say to the gentleman, is not, as I understand it now, being continued. I think I am justified in saying that there is no other place than this whereby teachers can find places and whereby schools can find teachers.

Now, gentlemen, this is, comparatively speaking, a very small amount.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HERSEY. Does the gentleman think it is very practical to raise the amount above $5,000 and not raise the pay of the teacher?

Mr. TOWNER. I will state to the gentleman that the pay of the teacher is being raised, else the school could not be supplied. I admit the gentleman is correct is one sense. You can not get teachers unless you pay them an adequate salary.

Mr. HERSEY. When you pay the teacher a reasonable wage you will have no trouble in finding teachers.

Mr. TOWNER. I hardly think the gentleman is justified in making that statement, because they have got to be found. It is not at all uncommon for a teacher to be sent from New York or Massachusetts or Maine to California or to Louisiana. And these men do not know these places; they can not know them. It is not a matter that is determined by advertisements.

There is no method of publicity for such proceedings as this for the purpose of ascertaining where a place is vacant and where the teacher is available. There seems to be no other method that has so far been devised except this being carried on by the Bureau of Education.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. What facilities has this bureau for determining that these people have special qualifications?

Mr. TOWNER. They send out questionnaires, or, rather, upon the application of the teachers or upon the applications of the schools for particular teachers inquiries are made, and then information is furnished to the schools, so that they may determine whether or not the applicant, or a person available, may or may not be secured for that purpose.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. And I would ask whether there are private agencies that are engaged in the same work, and why they would be less efficient than this Government bureau in selecting teachers? These are special teachers, I understand?

Mr. TOWNER. A great many of them. The private educational employment agencies are, of course, paid agents. Both the schools that desire to secure the teachers and the persons who desire to secure employment, as I understand it, are compelled to pay the employment agencies. And it is natural, I suppose, that the universities and colleges and schools for principalships and superintendents should send to the Bureau of Education, making inquiry if it can supply them or furnish them or put them into communication with certain teachers that they desire.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Can the gentleman state to what extent, if he has the information, this bureau was able to furnish teachers, say, in the last year?

Mr. TOWNER. I wish I could give the gentleman the figures. They are very large and very satisfactory. They have done really a very great work in this emergency. They are doing it now. Of course, they have on hand much which could be made available. They have on hand now a great accumulation of material that could be made efficient if they had sufficient means to carry on the work. Five thousand dollars would not do more than enable them to maintain a nucleus of the department. They will not be able to carry on the work, as I understand it, with merely that amount. This increase from $5,000 to $20,000 for this great educational work in this particular emergency is amply justified, it seems to me, and therefore I have offered the amendment for this increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. TOWNER] made a splendid address this morning, one of the best I have heard in many a day; and I was particularly gratified when he reached that portion of it wherein he stated that all of these war activities, now that the war is over, should cease, and I was somewhat surprised, therefore, when, immediately after this paragraph was reached, he offered an amendment to continue a war-time activity.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will yield for a question.

Mr. TOWNER. Does the gentleman think that the procurement of teachers for the schools is a war-time activity?

Mr. GOOD. Well, we never had an appropriation before, within my recollection, which carried money for an agency to secure teachers for our schools. This was a war-time appropriation of $25,000. It was from the President's fund.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says this is a small amount. That is the hard fact that the Committee on Appropriations has to go up against every day. It is the thousands of small items that reach into the millions and even billions when it comes to summing up appropriations.

Now, the commissioner estimated for a director for this service at $4,000. He estimated for an assistant director at $3,000. The committee did feel, for this year at least, that some of this work should be carried on while people are getting settled and teachers are finding places. It may be possible that it will be carried on as a permanent thing, as a sort of clearing house. But as I said, $5,000, if rightly expended, will permit them to maintain in the Bureau of Education a clearing house, with a chief clerk at $1,800 and a couple of stenographers to answer all inquiries, to receive questionnaires, to handle the information that teachers, directors of school boards, and trustees of colleges can supply, and to furnish such information as really ought to be available as a governmental activity.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield.

Mr. LAYTON. Is it not a fact that in all the States of the Union for the most part there is a great difficulty in getting teachers? There is not a surplus of teachers, but there is great difficulty in obtaining them?

Mr. GOOD. I think that is true, and I think it is because—and it is to be regretted—the salaries of teachers have not kept pace with the salaries paid to people in other positions requiring a like amount of intelligence and ability.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. FAIRFIELD and Mr. CANNON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire recognition?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized as a member of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, thank God the war, while not technically over, is practically over and we are getting back to normal. We have great trouble about the high cost of living. It is very simple. The increased price of commodities and the high cost of living come from the decreased purchasing power of the dollar. It is now about 50 cents. Put in another way, 50 cents when the war broke out would buy as much as $1 does now. If the war had kept on, God knows how far the currency would have been expanded and how much our credit would have been lowered. We have been very fortunate in keeping up the credit of the Government, notwithstanding the great increase in the currency and the liberty drives and the great issue of bonds. It is very fortunate, indeed, that the credit of the Government remains substantially unimpaired.

You may say, "What has that to do with this proposition?" The organizations authorized by war-time law—and I am not abusing any of them at this time—did much good work, and there was necessarily extraordinary demands upon the Treasury and much of waste and extravagant expenditure. If the respective States having common schools and caring for the agricultural schools and colleges—and there are a great number of colleges that do not depend upon appropriations—will perform their functions, as they are performing them now practically, in my opinion, for peace time, we will not have much trouble. As the cost of products decreases and the compensation of certain people and teachers amongst the communities increases, under the law of demand and supply we will get back to peace conditions.

I am not going to make any attack on this Bureau of Education. I will not say what some people suspect, that this is to pay very considerable salaries to monopolize the superintendence of teachers all over the country, somewhat similar to the work of the Department of Labor, duplicating to some extent the work of the Department of Education; "cooperating," they say. So far as I am concerned, I would be willing to make a motion to strike out this $5,000 entirely. Let us get back to normal.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. I would like to ask whether if it is not a fact that practically all the States of the Union have an educational employment bureau to supply the public schools?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes. That is a fact. I hope to live to see a return to normal conditions not only touching this industry, which would increase greatly if its demands were complied with, but with respect to many other industries, centralizing in Washington the functions of the Government with high-priced employees when centralization is not needed. Great heavens! I want to get back to let the States perform their functions. [Applause.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one minute.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I think there is no doubt that every university in this country has an agency of its own to place its own products. Every State in the Union has an educational department, and information as to men who are available is not difficult to obtain. What I object to chiefly is not the increased $20,000 for this year; but once the nose of the camel is into the Treasury there are limitless possibilities about this whole thing; and I am quite in sympathy with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who would strike out even the $5,000, but perhaps it ought to remain in. So I think, gentlemen, it is just as well to get away from extending and increasing the centralizing powers that will take business, education, and incidentally, perhaps, religion or no religion—which is a man's attitude on the subject of religion—away from the locality and concentrate it in Washington. So, perhaps, we should look, not to the cutting out of the amount carried for this year but to the possibilities of the future.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. LAYTON. I move to strike out the paragraph, lines 3, 4, and 5, on page 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware moves to strike out the paragraph. The question will first be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], which is in the nature of a perfecting amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Has debate been exhausted on the paragraph and the amendment just offered?

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] to strike out the paragraph.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BROWNING having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6410) authorizing the city of Boulder, Colo., to purchase certain public lands.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

OUT OF THE POSTAL REVENUES.

OFFICE OF THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL.

For payment of limited indemnity for the injury or loss of pieces of domestic registered matter, insured, and collect-on-delivery mail for the fiscal years that follow:

For 1918, $100,000;

For 1919, $300,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to bring to the attention of the committee two items in connection with this matter of indemnity. In looking over the request for appropriations to take care of these indemnities on parcel-post matter I notice that in 1918 we appropriated $320.000 for this item. The first deficiency bill asked for $180,000 and the second deficiency bill for $650,000. In 1919 the appropriation was $670,000. The amount asked for by the department when the first deficiency bill of this year was up was $890,000 and the estimate for this next year reaches the sum of $2,000,000. I am interested to know why this sum is so rapidly growing, from $320,000 last year to $2,000,000 this fiscal year.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I do not have personal knowledge with regard to the matter. The question of the necessity of making the appropriation was gone into quite fully, but I do not believe the phase of the question to which the gentleman calls attention was brought out in the hearing of the officials of the Post Office Department. These amounts are paid out in small sums. My recollection is that the average payment is not over $5 or $6.

Mr. FESS. Between $3 and $10, I understand.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; the average, as I understand it, is about $6, or perhaps nearer $7. Now, I do not know whether it is because of the increased use of the insurance provision by persons who send by parcel post. It is barely possible that people have commenced to insure parcel-post matter more than they did formerly. The gentleman understands that formerly the Government did not insure the packages at all. Now, with the increased use of the insurance the gentleman can well see that there would be an increase in the liability of the Government. My recollection is that the amount appropriated for this purpose is about one-half the amount collected in insurance premiums. For example, in 1913, the fees collected amounted to only $259,000, while in 1918 they amounted to $3,229,000, and in 1919 it is estimated that they will reach $4,130,000. The indemnities for 1914 amounted to $175,000, whereas in 1918 they amounted to $1,180,000, and the estimates for this year amount to $1,351,000. It is barely possible that we are losing more mail than formerly. I do not know. The figures I have read would indicate that it is largely on account of the increased use of the service.

Mr. FESS. I would say to the chairman of the committee that I made a little investigation along this line, due very largely to some complaints that had come to my office about the difficulty in collecting indemnities; and in going into the matter I noticed this rapid increase in the amount of appropriations, which it seemed to me called for some explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. It occurred to me that in addition to the increased business under insurance there might also be an increase of the losses, due to the Government handling of the business.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FESS. I will yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. When the Post Office Department made their estimate to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads on this particular item there was some discussion about the increase in the amount appropriated to pay these losses, and it was brought out that the number of insured parcels had very greatly increased, and, of course, also the losses had naturally increased in proportion, and that in addition to that the large amount of mail matter sent to the different cantonments had caused more losses than there would be in the ordinary course of the service.

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend from Texas that I also asked about that particular item, and that there had been a great many parcels sent to cantonments, and that the possibilities of loss were greter in that connection than in the regular service. I want it very clearly understood that my queries are based upon a full realization that it is not altogether proper to do nothing except find fault, because the public not having settlements made readily would at once become irritable. It is not that, it was to get at why this was growing. I was attempting to find just how we adjudicated the cases. It seems to me, if I may be permitted to make the statement without seeming to criticize, that we ought to have a little better plan for some sort of record in the department of the transportation of the articles insured. I have tried to find whether there is the name of the one to whom the package is addressed, whether the name of the sender is kept, whether the amount that is being sent is known, whether when a claim is made we might get at it to ascertain whether the Government is being in any way defrauded on misrepresentations by the sender. I have not been satisfied myself that the Government is guarding its own rights along that line. I have understood that there is a general order that expedites the settlement of smaller claims because they have so rapidly grown and accumulated. So that claims of about $5 and under are rushed through rapidly, and the question is whether the Government is guarding itself against false claims so as not to lose unduly. Let me ask my friend from Texas if there is a record kept?

Mr. BLACK. I will say to the gentleman that I do not think they keep a record with the same particularity that they do of registered mail packages, but of course it is the custom of the Post Office Department to require a very definite proof of the loss. I have no doubt that in spite of that fact the department is imposed upon at times, just as the loss and damage claims against railroads are sometimes put in that are not justified.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this suggestion. In the first place, one of the principal difficulties in matters of this kind is the incomplete and insufficient addresses often put on by the parties sending the packages.

In regard to the keeping of records, I do not know just what records are kept.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word Now, I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that I do not know whether the Post Office Department here is keeping the records, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio. Of course, a record is kept in the local post office, and when a loss occurs the Post Office Department must necessarily depend on the records in the local post office. It would be a fine system to keep the records in the General Post Office here, but it must readily occur to anyone that to do so would put an additional burden on the already overburdened employees in these places, especially in the smaller places where they are allowed a very small amount for clerk hire and insufficient compensation.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BEE. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It was stated to me on inquiry that the record was not being kept because it would entail an expenditure that would not be commensurate with the advantage that would accrue.

Mr. BEE. The only way that the records could be satisfactorily kept would be for Congress by appropriate legislation to increase the compensation of postmasters all over the country, especially in the small fourth-class post offices, giving them additional help because when a person brings a package to mail the clerk has to fill in the different blanks and memorandum and have them signed, and those are kept in his office, but to cause them to keep records for transmission to the General Post Office would require, in many instances, the services of additional clerks.

In many of these offices the clerk hire, as the gentleman knows, is only a few dollars a month, which is an addition to some one who is already employed there. I do not think there is any chance for fraud against the Government in matters of this sort, more than there is in general claims against the railroads. Of course, frauds will creep in. If the Congress desires post offices, both in local offices and the central office, to keep complete and perfect records by which all matters could be definitely and quickly traced, they would have to largely increase the force.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask the gentleman if he thinks the additional expense would reach anything like the increase in saving?

Mr. BEE. I think the additional expense would not be commensurate with the advantages that were sought to be gained because the losses are not so very extensive, there are not so many, and can most always be proven by the only record that is kept.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I have an impression that the extraordinary increase in losses is through the mail-order houses in the large cities, and that when you come to the fourth-class post offices there are not many packages that originate there. A good many are received because these mail-order houses are sending packages all over the country.

Mr. BEE. I think the gentleman from Illinois is correct. In other words, the history of the smaller post offices is that it is very seldom that these packages originate there. If so, they are for the transmission of trinkets and personal things between friends. The great bulk of the parcel-post matter comes through the enlargement and enhancement of mail-order houses which send to all persons of the country. It is a fine system, but sometimes it is destructive of the little fellow who has the country store and has built up a business and the parcel post is driving him out. However, the parcel-post system is of great advantage to the people and should be maintained in its full force and effect.

For additional clerical and subclerical employees in the Department of Justice in the District of Columbia, $12,000.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. When appointed to that committee I well understood that it was not expected to concern itself with appropriations, but was expected to concern itself with expenditures that had been made. I further understood that it was not likely that this committee would extensively function. In this expectation I have not been disappointed. I wish to take this opportunity to call to the attention of the chairman of the committee in charge of the matter now before us, in connection with his study of methods for improving the financial methods of our Government, the fact that inevitably I have contrasted the method here in use with that in use in a legislative body with which I am very familiar through somewhat long service. I have no grievance, no hobby to ride, no complaint to make, but venture the observation that there may be found merit in the system in use in my own State and in some other States, wherein a preliminary study of appropriations is made by a specialized committee whose judgment is then put at the command of the finance committee. For instance, in the few States that use this method, the judiciary appropriations now under consideration would have gone, first, for the study of a specialized committee. Its recommendations, if favorable, would then have been passed on by the Committee on Appropriations. The advantage of this system is that it secures weeding out of a great mass of trivial or worthless proposals which otherwise would take the time of the committee on finance; and in the second place it brings to the subject the study of men who, by year after year of service on the specialized committee, acquire a familiarity with the topics which makes their advice of value. Inasmuch as this method has been found of great service in the States to which I refer, is not a novel proposal, has been tested by long experience, I trust that the gentleman so much interested in reforming our financial procedure, and in charge of recommending to us new methods accompanying a budget proposal, will give the possibility of following the example of these legislative bodies serious consideration. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of antitrust laws: For the enforcement of antitrust laws, $200,000: Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof, not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 5, after the semicolon, strike out the balance of line 5, and also lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, and insert: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products or associations of farmers or organizations, corporate or otherwise, of farmers and others who organize and cooperate in an effort to and for the purpose to prepare for market and market and obtain and maintain a fair price for their products or the products of the members of any such association or organization.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is to broaden somewhat the scope of the language of the bill and at the same time include farmers' marketing organizations, which I believe it was intended to include within the scope of the language. In the western part of the country there are organizations of farmers, or farmers' marketing organizations, which do not consist entirely of farmers, and I want to say to the Members of the House that I believe they are the most successful farmers' marketing organizations in existence. They are to-day the models that are followed by farmers' marketing organizations all over the United States. For 20 years the farmers and fruit growers of California tried to market their products by means of cooperative marketing associations. Year after year those organizations failed, not the same organizations, necessarily, but one was succeeded by another, and each was a failure until finally the scheme was adopted of incorporating and having capital stock. When this scheme was adopted the farmers' cooperative marketing associations in that part of the country were just about as far below par as they possibly could be in the estimation of the farmers. But, in order to help the cause along, bankers, business men, and professional men put money into these associations and bought stock for the purpose of helping the farmers in their communities and thereby helping their communities. Every one of those associations is to-day successful. As I say, they stand as the models of farmers' cooperative market associations throughout the country. They have established credit.

I know of my own knowledge that the first association of fruit growers that was organized along these lines in the year 1913 found it almost impossible to borrow $60,000 from the banks in order to handle the 1912 hold-over crop of raisins in our section of the country. Only a few days ago I was reading in one of the Washington papers that the banks of New York City had combined to advance to the California Associated Raisin Co., which is the first of these organizations to be formed, unlimited credit to handle the crop of the year 1919.

My purpose, as I stated a moment ago, in offering this amendment is to broaden the scope of the language, but at the same time I believe that it follows a meaning of the language in the bill.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. I want to say to the gentleman that I am not opposed to his amendment if it is necessary to vote upon it; on the contrary, I am in favor of it; but I would like to know from the gentleman and from the House generally whether there is any law in this country that prevents any organization of individuals from any combination or agreement having in view the increase of wages, and so forth, or is there any law in the country that prevents producers of farm products and associations from pursuing that course in order to obtain a fair and reasonable price?

Mr. BARBOUR. I believe there is. I will say to the gentleman that I understand that the Clayton Act exempts labor organizations from the provisions of the antitrust law. It was intended at that time, as I understand, and as I am told, to exempt farmers' organizations; but the language of the Clayton amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. But the language of the Clayton amendment does not seem to exempt these marketing organizations.

Mr. LAYTON. I should support the gentleman's amendment.
Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BARBOUR. I will.
Mr. IGOE. As I caught the reading of the gentleman's amendment it refers to "others," to associations whether incorporated or not. How far would the gentleman go with this exemption?
Mr. BARBOUR. The last clause of the amendment limits its operation, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri, because that clause holds the organization to the marketing of the products of members of the organization.
Mr. IGOE. What does it mean by "others"?
Mr. BARBOUR. It means simply this, as I stated a moment ago——
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.
Mr. BARBOUR. I would ask for one more minute.
Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if we can agree on time for debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto. I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to—how much time does the gentleman want?
Mr. BARBOUR. Only sufficient to answer questions—five minutes.
Mr. HERSMAN. I would like to have some time.
Mr. GOOD. I will modify the request and say that all debate upon this amendment be limited to 25 minutes. I will only take 5 minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the debate upon this amendment be limited to 25 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
Mr. IGOE. I want to find out from the gentleman whether this amendment would go to the extent——
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.
Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I am trying to get the scope and effect of the amendment of the gentleman by his inclusion in the amendment of the word "others" and also the use of the word "corporate." What I am trying to get at is this: Whether people who are not farmers, who are not producers, may engage or go into combination with those who are producers or with others in a similar situation and will they secure protection from prosecution?
Mr. BARBOUR. Now, in answer to that, I will again call the attention of the gentleman to the one organization particularly which I have in mind, which exists in California, and I have no doubt that there are others similar. When this organization was first proposed they had had several years' experience with cooperative market organizations, every one of which had been a failure. The suggestion was then made, in order to establish and create an association which would have a credit, that they incorporate under the laws of the State, with capital stock, fixed capital, and all the other attributes of a corporation. The farmers had had such disastrous experiences with the old cooperative associations that some of them did not take enthusiastically to the idea. Then it was organized as a sort of a community proposition, everybody getting behind it for the benefit of the community, merchants subscribing to stock, professional men subscribing to stock, and bankers. And now the percentage of stock that these men own is very small, compared with the total.
Mr. IGOIE. But suppose the packers get into some combination, what is to prevent them from being exempt from prosecution under the antitrust laws under this appropriation?
Mr. GOOD. Why should they not be exempt from prosecution just as much as any other combination of producers? If they unnecessarily increase prices——
Mr. IGOE. I am not asking that question.
Mr. GOOD. They do an unlawful thing.
Mr. IGOE. I am trying to get the effect of the gentleman's amendment. Of course, if the gentleman wants to exempt packers, I suppose he will not authorize any money to be appropriated or authorize any money——
Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is mistaken or he would not say that.
Mr. IGOE. The gentleman seems inclined to think packers and everybody else ought to be exempted.
Mr. GOOD. I would not exempt anybody guilty of violating the law, any more than any other violator of the law. Every violator of the law ought to be punished and——
Mr. IGOE. What I am trying to ask the gentleman from California is, How far he wants to extend the exemption that Congress has been writing into the laws in the past? We find ourselves up against the proposition that producers—that dairymen—are exempt. I am not going to argue that question, but are you going to permit the men who retail the milk in the cities, for instance, the distributors, now, to be protected from prosecution when you allow them to go and organize, to go out themselves and make a combination that will hold up the price to the people in the cities still further? I am not making any claim that this exemption is justified that is in the law now, but I want to call the attention of the House to the effect of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from California and ask if it is not worthy of serious consideration.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard in opposition to this amendment. At the present time the prosecuting officers of the United States Government in the State of New York are busily engaged in an effort to reach the gentlemen who have been increasing the price of milk in the city of New York, who do not happen to be farmers but who happen to belong to some of these organizations. If this amendment goes through the very thing that the United States authorities are trying to do there is going to be stopped immediately, because it prohibits the use of any of this $200,000 for that purpose. Now, I know the gentleman from California did not want to bring about such a condition of affairs, yet that is the effect of the language of his amendment.
Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SIEGEL. I certainly will.
Mr. BARBOUR. My amendment does not do that.
Mr. SIEGEL. The last line of your amendment takes in anybody who may belong to that organization. He does not have to be a farmer. He can be a manufacturer or the kind of a man who simply wants to get into an organization for the purpose of increasing the price. And that is what they have done in the State of New York, and that is why the people of the city of New York to-day are fighting hard to bring the price of milk down to a reasonable figure and not have it kept up.
Mr. BARBOUR. The last line of my amendment, the last clause, provides that these organizations, whether they are composed entirely of farmers or farmers and others——
Mr. SIEGEL. That is the point—"and others."
Mr. BARBOUR. Must market the product produced by farmers who are members of the organization. They could not go outside of the organization.
Mr. SIEGEL. I will say to you, gentlemen, that I have read the amendment very carefully. In the last line it reads:

And others who organize in an effort for the purpose to prepare for market, and market, and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products or the products of the members of any such association.

And there is not anything in the world to prevent any Tom, Dick, Jack, or Harry, farmers or otherwise, from organizing such an association and putting up the price, as they have done in the State of New York. And I do not know of any amendment that would arouse more popular wrath than this kind of an amendment, which would permit this kind of an organization, because this is the very thing these organizations in the State of New York are trying at the present time to do, to prevent these profiteers from being sent to prison, where they properly belong. And they have put the price up to 18 cents.
Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SIEGEL. I will.
Mr. PLATT. Is there anything in the present law to prevent an organization being organized to handle a single product?
Mr. SIEGEL. It goes a step further. It says that no part of this fund shall be used for that purpose, and at this very minute, while we are discussing it here, the United States district attorney for the southern district of New York is engaged in preparing testimony and evidence in order to prosecute, and you take away the money from them.
Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SIEGEL. I will.
Mr. LAYTON. What I would like to know is this: Do you not believe that the great agricultural interests of the country have a right to organize intelligently in order to get the best results for their labor, when you accord that privilege to everybody else in the country?
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on the amendment.
Mr. HERSMAN. Mr. Chairman——
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. HERSMAN] is recognized for five minutes.
Mr. HERSMAN. I will say that at the present time there are pending two bills before the Judiciary Committee to clarify the situation in regard to the farmers of our Nation. I think there is not a person in this Congress that, knowing the situation, does not realize that it is vital to the farmers of this Nation to organize into cooperative associations, not only for their own protection but for the protection of the consumer. The farmer is helpless when it comes to bargaining alone. Individually he can not protect himself against his organized enemies. He has never had a thing to say as to the price at which he should sell his goods or the price he should pay for his goods. The speculators and the gamblers of this country have taken charge of the farm products of our Nation, greatly to the detriment of the farmers and to the detriment of the consumers.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSMAN. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does the gentleman know of any instance where any farmer has violated the laws of the land in reference to the antitrust act?

Mr. HERSMAN. I will say that at the present time the antitrust act is in such shape that the farmer does not know what his position is.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is right.

Mr. HERSMAN. Those that produce the milk, not the men that deliver the milk, are under indictment in three States at the present time. At the present time the raisin growers of California are directed to appear before the Federal Trade Commission to show cause why they should not be indicted. I believe the Congress of the United States wants to give the farmer a chance, not to avoid the Sherman antitrust law nor to combine in restraint of trade, nor to combine for unlawful purpose, but the Congress of the United States wants to say that when the farmer engages in collective bargaining he is not in violation of the law, because he can not bargain alone.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HERSMAN. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Is that the way to get at it? Is not this the absolutely wrong way to get at it, to say that a thing is a crime, and then that a certain class of our communities shall not be prosecuted for violating it?

Mr. HERSMAN. Yes. I was not in here when this was first brought up, but I have heard enough to know that if the opportunity comes you gentlemen will say that the farmer, when he combines in a cooperative movement, is not in violation of the laws of this land. I want to tell you that the serious milk situation is not the fault of the farmer. Any man knows that the milk situation of this country and the high prices are controlled by world-wide conditions. The price of milk is reflected each day by the price of butter and cheese, and the farmers of this country are not getting an unreasonable price for their milk. There are 13 separate and distinct delivery wagons bringing milk to one apartment house of this city, and the waste comes not from the farmer, but from the distributing of that milk. And I will tell you, if I have time, where the farmers' cooperative marketing associations have increased production in their particular line 300 and 400 per cent. The almond growers of California were helpless under the old system. Their orchards were being neglected all over our great State, and the almond grower was getting 25 cents out of the consumer's dollar. Under cooperation he is to-day getting 75 cents out of the consumer's dollar and has never raised the price to the consumer through all these years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HERSMAN. I want just one minute in which to say this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I represent almost wholly an agricultural district. Never have I up to this time had a farmer or a representative of a farmer say to me that he was doing anything that was questionable under the antitrust law or that he had been accused of doing such a thing. His acts had never been questioned in that regard and no one has ever asked me to support this provision. I do not know where this whole legislation came from in regard to the farmer, but when I read that provision and when the committee read it I almost had to hang my head in shame to think that this Congress or that any Congress had placed on the statute books a law that prevented the prosecution of a crime.

I am in hearty sympathy with what President Wilson said when signing the sundry civil bill on June 23, 1913. He said he approved it because there were ample appropriations for the Department of Justice without touching this appropriation. But this is what he said:

> I have signed this bill because I can do so without, in fact, limiting the opportunity or power of the Department of Justice to prosecute violations of law by whomsoever committed. If I could have separated from the rest of the bill the item which authorizes the expenditure by the Department of Justice of the special sum of $300,000 for the prosecution of violations of the antitrust law, I would have vetoed that item, because it places upon the expenditure a limitation which is, in my opinion, unjustifiable in character and principle; but I could not separate it.

Further on he says:

> I can assure the country that this item will neither limit nor in any way embarrass the action of the Department of Justice on other appropriations supplying the department with abundant funds to enforce the law. The law will be interpreted in the determination of what the department should do by independent and I hope impartial judgments as to the true and just meaning of the substantive statutes of the United States.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. No; I can not yield.

Mr. LAYTON. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GOOD. Now, gentlemen, this bill carries a provision—to do what? To increase prices? No. The country to-day is not suffering because of low prices. It is suffering because prices are too high, and is demanding that they be reduced, and we carry here a provision to give the Department of Justice every penny it asks for, not to protect the man who is violating the law, not to place him in a class by himself and say to him, "You can violate the law with impunity and go scot free," but is to say to the hoarder, to say to the profiteer, to say to the violator of the law, "You must obey the law or you will be punished." And we have given the Department of Justice all it has asked for, every dollar it has asked for, to stop this combination or unlawful conspiracy to increase prices.

Why, the gentleman's amendment would permit these associations of farmers to cooperate with the packers, and they could raise the price of meats to any limit they desired, and yet the department could not spend a dollar of this appropriation in prosecuting them. It would permit an association of farmers to enter into a combination with an association of canners to place canned goods on the market at a certain increased price, and to hold them until they got the price, and not a penny of this appropriation could be used to prosecute them. Already, as President Wilson pointed out, we have gone far afield in throwing about the violators of the law certain immunities. I am not willing to go a step further. I would go back and wipe the whole thing from the statute books if I could. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. CANNON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I, too, represent one of the best agricultural districts in the United States. I think I want to protect my constituents, whether they are engaged in coal mining or manufacturing—and there is much of coal mining and much of manufacturing in my district as there is also elsewhere in the State of Illinois. I believe in all legislation that will prevent conspiracies to increase prices beyond a reasonable limit.

Let us look at the thing a minute. Because a man, an American citizen, works in a coal mine, or works in a brickyard, or works on a farm, or is a merchant, or a packer, or what not, all the laws of the United States, like the grace of God, ought to cover every citizen of the United States, without discrimination or differentiation, rich and poor, great and small, alike. [Applause.]

Now, I am not for this amendment because I think it goes beyond the present law. Much has been said about the Clayton Act and the Sherman Antitrust Act. If the laws need amendment, let legislation amending them originate with the Committee on the Judiciary, with the proper committee under the rules of the House, rather than upon an appropriation bill. The jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations is confined to the recommendation of appropriations to the House of Representatives for its consideration, pursuant to existing law.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. CANNON. I have only five minutes.

Mr. BARBOUR. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANNON. Make it very brief.

Mr. BARBOUR. Was not practically the same language that is included in this bill, after the word "further," included in the bill which Congress passed a week or 10 days ago, to prohibit hoarding, affecting the farmers?

Mr. CANNON. I was not on the Committee of Agriculture and probably was not in the House when the bill the gentleman refers to was considered. I do not know whether it was passed or not, but I am not in favor of giving any combination of American citizens, or people that deal in America, who are not citizens, in whole or in part, exemption where it is denied to all the other citizens of the United States. [Applause.]

Now, there is much abuse of the packers. I do not know whether they are guilty or not under the law. They say that their total profits are only 2 per cent. I am not going to discuss that. But if they have unlawfully conspired to cooperate to fleece the people, then they ought to be prosecuted under the laws that exist. But I am for extending just as much protection to the packers and to the mail-order houses and to the merchants and to the coal miner and to the farmers as to any other class. They should all be treated alike. Let the laws cover all the people in the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HERSMAN rose.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUCE: Page 17, line 1, amend by striking out the words "or individual" and inserting in place thereof the words "other than an organization of public officers or any individual other than a public officer," so as to read:

"Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization other than an organization of public officers or any individual other than a public officer," etc.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, two wards of the district that I represent are in the city of Boston, and therefore within the scope of the recent activities of the striking members of the Boston police department. This amendment is intended to put upon record the expression of this House, if it see fit, to the effect that the action of those policemen was what the governor of the Commonwealth has described as desertion and what the President of the United States has called a crime. [Applause.] While this amendment possibly has no direct influence or bearing upon the situation, it will, at least, tell the people that we, representing the people, agree with the President of the United States and with the governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and with all thoughtful men who have discussed this subject, that for public officers to desert their duty is a betrayal of duty. [Applause.] If time permitted and if it were of consequence, I would enter upon a discussion of the question of what is a public officer. I could recite to you at length the decisions of the courts holding that policemen are public officers—agents of the people. I could read to you a court decision showing that firemen are public officers; and I am thankful to tell you that the firemen of the city which, in part, I represent have given out the word that they do not intend to strike, that they do not intend to betray the government they have undertaken to serve, but that they will stand faithfully by the obligations of their office. [Applause.] All I ask is that you to-day shall make this particular declaration that the antitrust laws, at any rate, shall not be so treated as to exempt from their operation our officers, the agents of the people, our servants, our soldiers who have enlisted to fight in times of peace battles against crime, just as important to the safety of society as those that have just been fought on the fields of France. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. The present law excludes labor organizations from the punishment prescribed for unlawful combinations, and the purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to take the officers of the law, such as policemen, out from under the protection of that section of the so-called Clayton antitrust law. Is that the gentleman's idea?

Mr. LUCE. That is my purpose, and my sole purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to support the amendment. I have listened with great interest to the discussion of these two provisos of this bill, and it occurs to me that it is probably time that we have an understanding about the attitude of Congress toward the laws of the Nation. I favored the bill recommended by the Agricultural Committee in exempting the farmer to some extent from the charge of profiteering, believing then and now that the farmer should be his own judge as to when he should market his product and as to how he should handle his crops. But to have a criminal statute making a thing unlawful, and then an appropriation for the Department of Justice to enforce the statute, and to say to the Department of Justice, "You shall not use any part of this appropriation to enforce this law against some individual," is, it seems to me, the wrong kind of legislation. [Applause.] I think we ought to strike out both these provisos as wrong. I represent a farming community, but if any law applies to my constituents making a thing a crime, I do not want to have to go around to the Department of Justice and say, "Here, you can not enforce that law against my constituents, because the appropriation which you have prevents you from doing it."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is not the language of this second proviso, after the words "Provided further," almost exactly the same as the language in the bill reported by the Agricultural Committee and passed by the House a week or 10 days ago?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes; but in the Agricultural bill we refused to make it unlawful for the men to do these things. Now, I say it is unnecessary for the Appropriations Committee to provide that the Department of Justice shall not use their money to enforce the law. I believe the action of the Committee on Appropriations in deciding what law they will permit the Department of Justice to enforce against certain classes and exempting others is wrong. I believe the committee charged with the responsibility of recommending a criminal statute should take that responsibility, and that the committee charged with the responsibility of furnishing funds to the Department of Justice should take their own responsibility; and while I can not agree with the chairman of this committee in his accord with the President with reference to the agricultural people of the United States, I do agree with him that these provisos should have been left out of this bill.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Does the gentleman know that the President was in accord with the distinguished ex-President, Mr. Taft, who vetoed a bill for the reason that a similar provision was in it several years ago?

Mr. TINCHER. I do not; but I am not surprised that he had to have some good precedent for one good act. [Applause.]

I shall offer an amendment before we pass this section to strike out both these exemption provisos, and I serve notice on the Committee on Appropriations now that when we have a criminal statute, if any class are to be exempted from penalties, that exemption should be in the law itself and not in the appropriation for its enforcement. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. If you will strike out both provisos I will vote for this; but my purpose in offering the amendment to the second proviso was not to stand here in defense of any of the trusts or of the packers. I want to say that if they had no stronger friend on the floor of this House than I am they would be in a mighty bad way; but I say we should make no exceptions whatever. That is the purpose of my offering the amendment. I am not standing here in defense of the packers or the trusts, because I hold no brief for them.

Mr. TINCHER. Or policemen, either.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and all time has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, has all time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. On the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. A perfecting amendment is pending offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FESS. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to be heard on the motion to strike out.

Mr. CANNON. Before the gentleman from Ohio begins, is the motion that is pending to leave the paragraph with an appropriation for the enforcement of the antitrust laws of $200,000 and striking out the two provisos?

Mr. FESS. Yes; the motion is to strike out the two provisos only.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FESS: Beginning at line 23, on page 16, strike out the two provisos.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment pending, and I ask for a vote on the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure at the present moment whether the gentleman's amendment is not a part of the proviso, and I do not want to strike that out.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is a part of the proviso.

Mr. PLATT. If we strike out the provisos there will be no object in the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LUCE. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is broader and includes my amendment. If his amendment goes through, and I hope to have the pleasure of voting for it, I shall be perfectly satisfied. [Applause.]

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOWELL. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts having been adopted, is it now in order to move to strike it out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts was in the nature of a perfecting amendment to the first proviso, and a motion to strike out that proviso and the rest of the paragraph is in order.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I was in the House when this discriminatory legislation was first enacted. I thought there was a good deal of virtue in the Clayton bill and was anxious to support it because of its general purpose, but I was one of the few Members of Congress that voted against that bill because it wrote this particular feature in it. [Applause.] It defined a legal statute and then proceeded to exempt certain classes from its operation.

I have from the beginning thought that if we in Congress begin on a legislative program that discriminates in favor of one or against another we put ourselves in the position to being discriminated against. [Applause.] While I wanted to support the legislation known as the Clayton bill because of its value, it had one vicious feature in it, and that led me to vote against it. The fundamental basis of the American Government is that security that all are equal under the law. Any step to deny that protection is the entering wedge of danger.

There was another case that came up soon after exempting certain groups of people from the operation of the antitrust law known as the Sherman law. I voted against it and urged its defeat on the same ground that I urged against the Clayton law, that it is wrong to first define a crime and then write in the same law an exemption from prosecution of certain classes. [Applause.]

If I vote for a law that will punish one colleague and will exempt from punishment another colleague, both doing the same thing, I open the door to dangerous legislation. [Applause.] Time and time again this exemption is written into various appropriation bills. Many of us have resisted the exemption until finally everybody gave up and said what is the use to go further. Even this committee I do not believe individually or collectively favor this sort of thing. It brings it in because it seemed under the drift of legislation there was no value in objection.

I insist, Members of this House, that the time is now here, judged by the rapid drift of disintegrating forces against law and order throughout the world, for the American people to make an issue upon making laws that will apply to everybody alike and thereby exempt nobody. [Applause.] Opening the door to this sort of legislation invites classes of people with immunity or without it, and with impunity to state to us definitely, in the form of a demand, that if we do not do so and so we will hear from them. Our mails are bringing such demands. I am ready to make that issue at any time. It will first appear in the form of class legislation, and then it will come in a demand for new exemption, then it comes in making demands, as was done in 1916, that this Congress interfere with private contracts as to whether these men's wages shall be increased, and we in a humiliating way surrendered the Government to that demand, as we did in 1916 in the Adamson Act.

Now comes, under the threat, that additional and inevitable demand that unless we do so and so the whole transportation business of the country will be paralyzed. This goes not to wages but to a principle of public service which approaches a revolution, and we are given the order that we are expected to pass certain laws at the behest of special classes in spite of public interest or else we will hear from the men who are now giving us orders. These men, inspired by their success in 1916, are but advancing step by step along similar lines. Following that you will have the same thing appear in the fire departments; it will come in the police department, which is now threatening the Capital and the city of Boston. Success in these departments and it will come in the Army and then in the Navy, and then you have Russian sovietism ripened into full bloom right here in America. [Applause.]

I say to you the time has come for us to make the issue. I for one am ready for it. If it must come, it is best to let it come now and not attempt to play with it. I hope the Members of this body will prove their heritage and will have the courage to stand by the American standards of life whatever it may mean and not be dictated to by any group of men whatever be their names or station, whether capitalist or laborer, manufacturer or farmer. We must stand for the public good even though to do so invites determined opposition. [Applause.]

Mr. HERSMAN. Mr. Chairman, I take issue to a certain degree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who just took his seat. The laws of this land say that when men combine in corporations they can discuss and set prices on their own goods, and they do so combine. We have great corporations, such, for instance, as the great steel corporations of this country. They do combine, and they are not in violation of the Sherman antitrust law; but if two farmers combine in this country they are in violation of the Sherman antitrust law and the Clayton Act.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSMAN. In just a moment. If two laborers combine, unless they are specifically excepted, they are in violation of the law. I say that the only way the farmers and the laborers of this country can bargain is by combination, and if you do not exempt them you take away from the laborer and farmer their only protection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSMAN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Combinations not in restraint of trade or in violation of law are already permitted, and I represent a farming district, and Springfield, Ohio, in my district, is a splendid manufacturing center, with a large organization of labor. I do not think either the farmers or the laborers in my district are demanding this sort of legislation.

Mr. HERSMAN. Then why at the present time are the farmers of California under indictment, and why are the farmers of New York under indictment for violation of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. FESS. I do not know that they are, but if they have violated the law they ought to be.

Mr. PLATT. They are not being indicted. They are only being questioned.

Mr. HERSMAN. There are two cases against them, and I tell you right now that the farmers of Illinois, the milk producers, were cited and kept in jail over night.

Mr. PLATT. Under State laws. Certainly if two farmers get together and incorporate as a selling organization, or three farmers or a thousand farmers, there is no law whatever to stop them, and they can take anybody in the city in or leave them out. They are simply an incorporation for selling purposes, and unless they are an absolute monopoly there is no law that can stop them. There is no reason for this exception.

Mr. HERSMAN. If they are not in violation of the law, why are they annoyed and assailed? Why are they cited to appear all the time, and why are the milk producers under indictment at the present time?

Mr. PLATT. In some cases they are claimed to be monopolies, and the matter comes under a State law. I do not think that they have been prosecuted under Federal law.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIEGEL. Only a few moments ago, in an amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR], the situation was practically explained by the addition of the words "and others." The other gentlemen who are in with the farmers, who combine with the farmers, are being placed under indictment, and properly so.

Mr. HERSMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from California may have gone that far, but that was not his intention.

Mr. SIEGEL. I agree with the gentleman there.

Mr. HERSMAN. His intention was to say that the farmers of the country when they combine for cooperative selling are not in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. They do not want to be exempted from prosecutions for a monopoly, the farmers of this country do not want to be exempted from prosecutions for restraint of trade. They only want you to say that they have a right to combine for cooperative selling, because they have no other rights, and if they can not combine to bargain collectively they can not bargain at all; individually they are helpless.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I think the argument upon this amendment has gone far afield from the language carried in the appropriation. I want to read what the provisions of the bill are with reference to labor and farmers' organizations:

Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof, not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

Mr. Chairman, the labor organizations which can not be proceeded against are only those which are organized solely for the purpose of bettering conditions of labor or shortening the hours of labor or increasing the wages of labor, and which are perfectly legitimate purposes; but where a labor organization undertakes to make a combination in restraint of trade, there is not the slightest thing in this provision to prevent the prosecution of that organization. The same is true with reference to farmers' organizations, which are formed only for the purpose of securing a fair and reasonable price for the product of their own labor; but where they organize in restraint of trade they are liable to prosecution. I want to read to you just what the Attorney General, the law officer of the United States Government, had to say in the hearings relative to this provision and his construction of it:

Well, the combination of wage earners which can not be proceeded against is a combination having in view the increase of wages, the shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor. If wage earners enter into a trust or combination in restraint of trade, not an association for the purposes set forth in the act, the fact that they work with their hands does not make them any less amenable to the law. This is only done to make it impossible to take action under the Sherman antitrust law against the union, against the labor organization, which has those purposes in mind. If men who belong to a labor organization go into a corporation, form a corporation which violates the Sherman antitrust law, they do not relieve themselves of liability because they happen also to belong to a labor union.

What Congress meant by it was that a labor organization formed for the purpose of increasing wages or shortening hours should not be considered a trust or combination in restraint of trade. That is what they meant by it, and that an association of farmers dealing in their own products should not be prosecuted under the Federal antitrust law, and this is the only way they could meet it; and while I would not say that we would not punish all violators of the law, because we will, I would not feel that I was free to give general instructions to persons employed and paid out of other funds to prosecute the persons you have said should not be prosecuted under this fund.

The proposition is whether you want to prevent labor from undertaking to better its condition or farmers from organizing for the purpose of securing a fair and reasonable price for their product. These objects are perfectly legitimate and proper, and Congress has so recognized them by carrying this identical provision for many years. They have never been relieved from liability in the event they should violate the Sherman antitrust law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from South Carolina desire to use the time he has?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I shall not use the five minutes. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has called to the attention of the committee that which I desired to call to their attention. The language of the second proviso is as follows:

That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

I remember when that proviso was first added to the appropriation bill. Its purpose was simply to express the intention of Congress as to the antitrust law, that an association of farmers organized for the purpose of obtaining a fair and reasonable price for farm products did not constitute a violation of the law. Now, certainly the Congress is not of the opinion that we should appropriate money to prosecute an association of farmers organized for the purpose of obtaining a fair and reasonable price for their products. If the association exists for any other purpose, then the exemption does not apply. An association of farmers is exempt only where it exists for the purpose of obtaining a fair and reasonable price for their products, and I hope this proviso will not be stricken out.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I agree with those gentlemen who have expressed disapproval of this method of legislating. I believe it is not good legislative policy to provide that certain things may not lawfully be done, and then to prohibit the expenditure of money for the enforcement of the law against the doing of those things. My purpose in taking this time, however, is to direct the attention of the committee to a few fundamental things with which we are indirectly dealing. It should be borne in mind, gentlemen, especially those of you who live in great cities like New York, that to-day agriculture is compelled to bid against every other industry in this country in getting the labor to produce the food that we folks who live in the cities must have to eat. The men who work in the cities are organized, and their wages are going up constantly. Every time their wages are increased, that industry for which they work increases its bid against agriculture for the men that agriculture must try to hold on the farm to produce that which we have to eat. It must not be forgotten that when the great industrial revolution came with the application of steam and electricity to transportation and to the development of power factories, the farmer was not able to organize the selling end of his business as were agriculture's industrial competitors. The products of the factory go upon the market carrying in their initial price the cost of production, every overhead charge, and a profit. The farmer's products go to the market to the highest bidder regardless of the cost of production. When the farmer comes to exchange his products with the manufacturer, his first question is: "What is yours worth?" and the next question, "What is mine worth?" That economical disadvantage operated against the business of agriculture has drained the country districts of population and poured people into the cities. One of these days you men who stand upon the floor here representing great cities, antagonizing and defeating agriculture's effort to successfully bid against industry for population and labor, your constituents will be asking, not with regard to the high cost of living but we will slip a cog in the machinery of production, and you will be asked, "Where on the face of the earth can we get the things necessary to keep ourselves alive?" [Applause.]

Gentlemen, this is not the way to legislate, I agree. I am willing to strike out both of these provisions, and let us come in here and legislate right. I have been trying since I have been a Member of Congress to have Congress enact legislation which will give the farmers of this country an opportunity to get their commodities to the market. But with each farmer competing against every other farmer, with his stuff going to the market to the highest bidder, with agriculture thus handicapped, having each man in its service offered higher and higher wages by the industries of the city, it becomes my concern and your concern that agriculture be given the necessary help to enable it to raise its bid to meet the higher bid of industry. I would like to know how, in the name of common sense, we can expect to maintain equilibrium of population as between the city and the country, with wages in the city going up and prices to the farmer going down. Nobody is compelled to farm. The free schools have liberated the country youth from ancestral vocation. He auctions himself off to the highest bidder. Do you want him to stay on the farm? Then agriculture must meet the bid of industry! That is all there is to it. In order for agriculture to meet that bid before the decimation of its population shall have progressed far beyond the danger point—it has already reached the danger point—and before its margin between current production and imperative necessity shall have been further reduced, something must be done to remove the economic handicap now resting upon agriculture, growing out of its disadvantage in the exchange of commodities. Any human activity which can put into its initial selling price the cost of production, every overhead charge and a profit, regardless of what its labor costs, can get more than its share of productive energy, when its competitor for this energy is compelled to accept the highest offer made, regardless of whether that offer covers even the cost of production.

To regard the difficulties of agriculture encountered in the sale of its commodities as being of vocational concern only is a narrow view which, if pursued, will bring us to the penalty of our folly. Cooperative associations, reducing economic and food waste in distribution, are in accord with the soundest public policy. They contribute to the individual and collective economy of those who purchase. Those who purchase must reach over beyond every waste, every intervening charge and profit, and give to the producer enough out of every dollar paid by the consumer to make the producer's total net profit as great as any other vocation offers to him. Personally I do not consider the dealing with these great problems of special vocational concern, through a comprehensive organization of those engaged in the vocation, as the best method. It is not a wise governmental policy which forces groups of citizens to organize for industrial warfare. Such a policy makes for industrial anarchy. It is a better policy for government to provide for the individual those facilities and that protection which is now being sought for through organization along vocational lines. Small marketing groups are not dangerous. Community organization is helpful, but at the point which marks the limit of community efficiency government should begin to function. The Agricultural Department should come into the same definite grapple with the problems of sale and distribution of farm products as with the problems of production and preservation of soil fertility, for these constitute the three big problems of agriculture.

Ever since I have been in Congress I have been trying to bring this about, and I warn you now, gentlemen, that either the Government must provide a marketing machinery through which the economic sale and distribution of farm products may be effected by small communities and small merchants, or great organizations and great businesses must do the work—organizations so great and comprehensive that they can dictate prices and policies, and businesses so great that they may fix their charges for services rendered through their power to levy toll rather than upon the basis of the economic value of the service rendered. And this in turn will lead, as it is leading, to an irresistible demand for bureaucratic control.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this provision exempting labor unions and farmers' organizations from prosecutions under antitrust laws was first adopted in the sundry civil act approved June 23, 1913. Shortly prior to that time the same provision was incorporated in the sundry civil bill and passed the House and the bill containing it was vetoed by President Taft and came back, as I recall, and was passed over his veto. After that it was again placed in the sundry civil bill and the bill was approved by President Wilson June 23, 1913, but at the time he approved it he appended to his approval the note I have read, in which he said he would have vetoed this provision in the bill if it could have been separated from the bill. He regarded it as vicious legislation. Now conditions have greatly changed since that time. They have changed right along the line of the suggestions of the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from South Carolina. The Clayton Act was enacted on October 15, 1914, more than a year after this provision first became law, and that act in section 6 provides:

SEC. 6. That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the antitrust laws.

That is the law, and since the enactment of that law it has been a waste of paper to place on the appropriation bill this limitation, for the limitation simply says that the money shall not be expended for prosecuting persons for that which the law says is not an offense. Now, I submit while we may continue to carry it just at this time when we are asking for the prosecution of every criminal, of every man who is a profiteer, of every man who is hoarding, of every man who is wasting or destroying the necessaries of life in order to increase the cost, I wonder whether or not we do not hold out to some one an invitation to violate the law by saying that he, because perchance he may be a member of some organization, is immune from prosecution under the law by reason of such membership.

We may talk all we please about the fair-price provision, but who is to determine what price is fair? The seller will say it is fair, but the buyer will say it is not. I will guarantee you this, that the farmer who is profiteering, and some of them are, will not say that the price he receives is unfair. The man that is selling shoes down on Pennsylvania Avenue at 100 per cent profit will say his price is fair. The man that is selling clothing at 100 per cent in advance of what he pays will say, "Oh, look at my expense; my advertising cost, my rent, my clerk hire, and all that. My price is fair." The question of whether a price is fair depends altogether upon all of the facts surrounding each individual case. And yet we hold out here an excuse for a man to violate the law, to profiteer, on the theory that perchance while the price of his produce is not fair, it will be impossible to prove that fact. I know that to strike this out will mean the raising of a political issue by some. There will be an attempt to make a political issue out of it. When, however, under present abnormal conditions we are appropriating money to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, both sides of the House ought to stand as a unit, insisting that every law, every criminal statute, should be enforced against the big criminal and the little criminal alike. [Applause.] And unless we do enforce these laws we will get no relief in the near future in the way of a reduction in the price of the necessaries of life. Let us leave no excuse for the enforcement of the law against every criminal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, may I be recognized? Let me read the first two lines:

Enforcement of antitrust laws: For the enforcement of antitrust laws, $200,000.

Now, then, in comes the two provisos. If they are stricken out, does it take from or confer any additional power in the expenditure of this appropriation?

Mr. GOOD. I do not think it makes any particular difference. I think this matter is all provided for in the Clayton antitrust law. The law has been changed since those provisos were enacted, and the Clayton law expressly states that membership in such organizations, and so forth, are not violation of the Sherman or any other antitrust law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HERSMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. I noticed in the reading of the Clayton Act it says, "Farm organizations without capital stock."

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. HERSMAN. But, as a matter of fact, practically all of the farm organizations found themselves in a position where they had to have capital stock in order to exist. And they have provision in here that, with or without capital stock, the farm organizations would be protected.

Mr. GOOD. It is stated in the alternative, not having capital stock or conducted for profit.

Mr. HERSMAN. But when you have capital stock you are conducting for profit. You can not assume any other position, because you have to pay dividends on your capital.

Mr. GOOD. They ought not to be permitted to pay dividends out of profits made in violations of the law.

Mr. HERSMAN. You have to pay dividends on your capital stock or you can not sell your stock to anyone.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN) there were—ayes 53, noes 19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of aliens: For expenses incident to the transportation of alien enemies to places of internment and to the return or removal of said aliens from places of internment in the United States to the countries of which they are citizens, or to their places of residence, or, in the discretion of the Attorney General, to such other places in the United States as they may elect; and for expenses of maintaining aliens in hospitals or otherwise outside of internment camps, $200,000, to be available also for expenses heretofore incurred for said purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking unanimous consent, in connection with this appropriation, for permission to insert in the RECORD a statement regarding the signing of the warrants, after a delay of 20 years, for the deportation of Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkmann as anarchists.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Department of Agriculture.

Mr. EAGAN and Mr. JOHNSON of Washington rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN], a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EAGAN: Page 21, after line 22, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the recent and sudden spread of the Japanese beetle in the State of New Jersey and to provide means for the control and prevention of spread of this insect in that State and to other States, in cooperation with the State of New Jersey and other States concerned and with individuals affected, including the employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $25,000: Provided, That not exceeding $1,500 of the foregoing amount may be used in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to reimburse owners of infested land for such damages as may occur by burning or any other action which may seem desirable in controlling the Japanese beetle.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas please state his point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that there is no legislation authorizing the matter, and it is not proper in an appropriation bill, where there should be no legislation authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Texas if that is the sole ground upon which he bases his point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, it is not germane to an appropriation bill, especially where there is no legislation authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. EAGAN. I wish to say that a small amount has been set aside for that purpose, Mr. Chairman, and this is simply to enlarge it, because of the very rapid growth of this pest in a limited area in New Jersey, which threatens to spread, according to the experts of the Department of Agriculture, all over the country. The State of New Jersey has appropriated $10,000 for this work, and an allotment of $25,000 has been made by the department to prevent the spread of this pest out of the appropriation of $105,780 for the investigation of insects affecting deciduous fruits, orchards, and vineyards. It is clearly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from New Jersey if this is a deficiency appropriation?

Mr. EAGAN. I do not know that it is a deficiency appropriation, but it is to meet a very serious emergency.

The Japanese beetle, according to information secured from various sources, is one of the worst insect pests occurring in Japan, and observations made on the infestation in New Jersey bear out this estimate of its dangerous character. The beetle attacks a very large list of plants, including many crops, ornamental plants, shrubs, and so forth, and attacks the foliage of apple and other fruit trees, and certain berry bushes, as well as canteloupes, watermelons, asparagus, rhubarb, sweet potato, and other vegetables. It also attacks ornamental and shade trees and vines.

It was introduced into New Jersey about 1911, probably in iris plants imported from Japan. Since its introduction the insect has become well established and has spread with considerable rapidity. The Department of Agriculture declares that "unless energetic measures are taken immediately to eradicate it, it will without doubt continue to spread eventually over the entire United States." At present the infestation is confined to a comparatively restricted area in Burlington County, in the State of New Jersey. State and Federal authorities are cooperating in the eradication and suppression work.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this is clearly a deficiency appropriation bill, and the appropriation suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN] is clearly not a deficiency. I submit to the Chair that his amendment is clearly subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from New Jersey if the printed matter submitted with his amendment was taken from the Agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. EAGAN. No; it was not. It was taken from the estimate submitted by the department for this particular item. As I have already stated, the sum of $25,000 has been allotted by the Department of Agriculture out of the $105,780 appropriation for the investigation of insects affecting deciduous fruits, orchards, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state in reference to the point of order that the purpose for which the expenditure is to be made is apparently to prevent the spread of injurious insects which are ravaging vegetation or crops in different sections of the United States. The proviso provides that in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture the owners of infested lands may be reimbursed for damages which may occur by burning or destroying vegetation or property, presumably in eradicating this pest. In the opinion of the Chair——

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to insist upon that particular proviso. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by eliminating the proviso.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EAGAN. Then I will offer the amendment with the proviso eliminated.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the purpose for which this paragraph is offered is covered by the basic law under which the Department of Agriculture is administered; but the Chair is not advised definitely as to the right of the Department of Agriculture to enter into agreements for the reimbursement of individuals for damages caused, and inasmuch as the proviso is a part of the amendment as offered, and the proviso seems to be out of order, the Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. EAGAN. Then I offer the amendment with the proviso eliminated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EAGAN: Page 21, after line 22, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the recent and sudden spread of the Japanese beetle in the State of New Jersey, and to provide means for the control and prevention of the spread of this insect in that State and other States in cooperation with the State of New Jersey and other States concerned and individuals affected, including employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $70,000, which shall be immediately available."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that that is not germane; that it is not a deficiency matter. This is clearly a deficiency bill, and there is no legislation authorizing it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that in the gentleman's own district money is being spent by the Department of Agriculture for the eradication of the boll weevil. I can not see any distinction between the eradication of the boll weevil in the interest of the constituents of the gentleman from Texas and the eradication of the Japanese beetle, which is affecting sections of New Jersey. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I happen to remember a decision that was made once by a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole when there was an appropriation made for the eradication of the boll weevil, and I submitted an amendment asking for an appropriation for the extermination of the gypsy moth, and they held that it was out of order, which, I should think, answers the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield? I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have not the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. To discuss the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; to discuss the point of order.

In that connection I would like to state that if this were a matter which constituted a menace to the people scattered over any substantial portion of the United States I would unhesitatingly withdraw the point of order. If it were not just merely a local matter that the State authorities could take up in New Jersey and handle, I would not object. The State of New Jersey has appropriated only $10,000 to fight it. The question of the boll-weevil menace was one that affected many of the Southern States, and the State of Texas has spent huge sums in an attempt to exterminate this pest.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And none in the Northern States.

Mr. BLANTON. It affected the cotton-growing industry, upon which the United States Government and other Governments largely depend. The cotton industry is not a local matter.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to his colleague?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. If the cotton districts were just a local matter, affecting just one State, clearly the point of order should have been made to that appropriation. But if the gentleman from New Jersey states that this is a matter which affects other localities, I will gladly withdraw the point of order.

Mr. EAGAN. I read from a communication of the Department of Agriculture:

Since its introduction the insect has become well established and has spread with considerable rapidity. Unless energetic measures are taken immediately to eradicate it, it will without doubt continue to spread eventually over the entire United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Since April this Congress has passed an appropriation bill specially for the Department of Agriculture, making appropriations for all matters that the Secretary of Agriculture called on Congress to appropriate for. Is not that the case?

Mr. EAGAN. The amount allotted, $25,000, for the control of the Japanese beetle pest, is utterly inadequate.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I hope my colleague will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. At the request of my colleague from Texas, who is a member of the Agriculture Committee, I withdraw it. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. The Japanese beetle was brought into this country by an importer of bulbs. Those bulbs were delivered to a nurseryman in New Jersey. The area involved now is about 14,000 acres.

This is a very destructive beetle. I think the item is clearly subject to a point of order, but I do not wish to make it. I think, perhaps, we could well afford to make some appropriation for this purpose. This is a bill to supply deficiencies in appropriations already made. There has been no specific appropriation made for this purpose, but an allotment of $25,000 by the Secretary of Agriculture out of another appropriation. This beetle is very destructive to vegetable life, and it seems that some methods are being applied that promise to eradicate it. The State of New Jersey, however, has not done its full share in this matter. It seems to me that the State ought to have appropriated a great deal more than $10,000 for the eradication of this beetle, when the Department of Agriculture had allotted $25,000.

If the gentleman will modify his amendment, making the amount $25,000, I will not interpose any point of order, as far as I am personally concerned; but I do feel that an expenditure of $95,000 out of the National Treasury would be too much, with only $10,000 appropriated by the State of New Jersey.

Mr. EAGAN. I think we ought to have at least $35,000. I think they made out a pretty good case before the committee.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman will modify his amendment so that the amount will not exceed $25,000, I will not insist on the point of order.

Mr. EAGAN. In view of the gentleman's statement I ask unanimous consent to amend my amendment by inserting "$25,000" instead of "$70,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his reservation of the point of order?

Mr. GOOD. I withdraw the reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out "$70,000" and inserting "$25,000." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. I will ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment further by striking out the words "which shall be immediately available."

Mr. EAGAN. I have no objection to that.

There was no objection.

The amendment of Mr. EAGAN as modified was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information in regard to lines 10 and 11 on page 21. This item is to increase the salaries of guards at the McNeil Island Penitentiary. I am informed that on the 5th day of August the guards at that penitentiary were notified that their pay for the month of July had been reduced 10 per cent, and they were paid $90, instead of $100. They work 12 hours a day.

Mr. GOOD. That was because they got an increase under an appropriation which expired on the 1st day of July. We are now proposing to appropriate an amount that will permit the guards in that penitentiary to receive graded pay, commencing at $70 a month for the first year, and increasing to $80 a month for the second year, $90 a month for the third year, and $100 a month for the fourth year of service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It seems that these guards have been struggling along on very small pay. I think in these times $90 and $100 a month is too small. They were receiving $100 a month, but, as I have stated, found that for the month of July their salaries were reduced to $90. Under that reduction I think a majority of the guards there have quit that employment. I want to ask what this $1,600 is for?

Mr. GOOD. That is to pay the increased compensation under the authorization which I have stated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is, after they have served four years?

Mr. GOOD. It will give an increase, as I understand it, to all those who have served more than a year. This item is based on the actual conditions as to service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This $1,600 does not reimburse the men who found that their July salary checks were $10 less than they had been receiving?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman for the information.

On motion of Mr. GOOD, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

LVIII——357

To Mr. CLARK of Florida, for this day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BANKHEAD, indefinitely, on account of the illness of his daughter in New York.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, the following concurrent resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution 9.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 175. Joint resolution to provide for the payment of travel pay upon discharge to men of the Regular Army enlisted prior to April 2, 1917; and

H. J. Res. 211. Joint resolution tendering the thanks of the American people and the Congress of the United States to Gen. John J. Pershing and to the officers and men of the American Expeditionary Forces.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE THOMPSON OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my painful duty to announce to the House the death of my colleague from Oklahoma, Hon. JOSEPH B. THOMPSON, a Representative from the fifth district of the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMPSON passed away about 6 o'clock yesterday evening, while on a Baltimore & Ohio train in West Virginia on his way home.

I shall not at this time undertake to offer any appropriate eulogy, but at some future time either myself or one of my colleagues from Oklahoma will ask that a day be set aside in order that proper tributes may be rendered to the distinguished services which the deceased rendered to his State and his Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOSEPH B. THOMPSON, a Representative from the State of Oklahoma.

Resolved, That a committee of 17 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as the committee on the part of the House Mr. FERRIS, Mr. CARTER, Mr. MORGAN, Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. MCCLINTIC, Mr. MCKEOWN, Mr. HOWARD, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Mr. JACOWAY, Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, Mr. DYER, Mr. KINCHELOE, Mr. RANDALL of California, and Mr. VAILE.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, September 20, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. FULLER of Illinois, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 326), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5565) granting a pension to Rose E. Wicoff, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, September 20, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

With unfeigned love welling up in our hearts, Father in heaven, author of our existence, we approach Thee in reverence and gratitude, for there is nothing stronger than faith, more inspiring than hope, nor warmer than love.

Guide us by Thy spirit through the changing scenes of a newborn day that we may prove ourselves worthy of Thy preferments. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SPECIAL CANCELLATION STAMP FOR ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take the bill S. 2972 from the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take the bill S. 2972 from the Speaker's table and consider it. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2972. An act to extend the cancellation-stamp privilege to the Roosevelt Memorial Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, what is the reason for taking this resolution up at this time?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Because the memorial association is going to have a drive from October 20 to October 27 to raise funds to erect an appropriate memorial to the late Theodore Roosevelt. The bill simply gives the Postmaster General authority to permit the use of cancellation stamps at such post offices as the Postmaster General may designate. In order to get any benefit of these cancellation stamps, as the drive will be on from October 20 to October 27, the bill should be passed immediately. It passed the Senate Monday, and it has been reported unanimously by the Post Office Committee of the House.

Mr. GARD. It has been acted upon by the Post Office Committee of the House?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes; with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, the bill is on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 2972) to extend the cancellation stamp privilege to the Roosevelt Memorial Association.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit the employment by the Roosevelt Memorial Association of a cancellation stamp bearing the following words: "Roosevelt Memorial Association, October 20–27."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out the language "by the Roosevelt Memorial Association of a cancellation stamp bearing the following words: 'Roosevelt Memorial Association, October 20–27,'" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "of special canceling stamps bearing the following words and figures: 'Roosevelt Memorial Association, October 20–27,' at such post offices as he may designate and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEYER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RAMSEYER had leave to extend his remarks on the bill in the RECORD.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, it will be of interest to Members to know, in this connection, what authorizations have been made for the use of special canceling dies or stamps since 1913. I submit for publication in the RECORD at this place a letter and memorandum from the Post Office Department which gives that information:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., September 19, 1919.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. STEENERSON: In response to your telephonic request of yesterday I submit herewith a memorandum giving a list of the special canceling dies authorized during the period from December, 1913, to June 30, 1917.

Since that time a special die was issued to the post office at Vicksburg, Miss., to advertise the national memorial reunion held in that city from October 16 to 19, 1917. In addition to this, special dies were authorized for use at 20 offices in California and Colorado, at the request of the Department of Agriculture, in connection with the campaign inaugurated by the Forest Service to prevent fires in the national forests. Special dies were also used during the war to stimulate the sale of the first, second, third, and fourth Liberty loans, and also at 50 of the largest offices in connection with the campaign to conserve food.

The dies issued at the request of the Department of Agriculture were paid for by the Forest Service, while those used at the request of the Liberty loan committee were paid for by the Department of the Treasury. The Food Administration paid for those issued at its request.

Very sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by my colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, before Carrol Council, Knights of Columbus, on the duty of the American citizen.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by his colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, on the duty of the American citizen. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9205, the deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FESS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee arose yesterday there was nothing pending, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional topographic and hydrographic draftsmen from October 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, inclusive, at annual rates of compensation as follows: Three at $2,000 each; three at $1,750 each; in all, $8,437.50.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, after line 22, insert the following: "For an amount to increase the compensation of the copper-plate engravers, in no case to exceed 33⅓ per cent of the basic compensation of any employee of the preceding item."

Mr. GOOD. The topographic and hydrographic draftsmen in this service are leaving because they can get so much higher pay in the Navy and other departments. The Navy pays practically twice as much, so we have increased the rate of pay in the Coast Survey not to exceed 33⅓ per cent. And so with the engravers. The question was overlooked by the committee. The engravers only receive one-half of what they receive at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. They are leaving to go into private establishments. This does not give them anything like what they are asking for, but it is thought that it will permit the continued employment of a part of the force if this increase is given. If not, we can not blame these men for leaving. They have been there for years and have had practically no increase except the bonus, whereas in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing the men receive as much as $3,000 per year and are doing practically the same grade of work—it may be a little finer. These engravers are receiving less, and we can not expect them to remain.

The amount is small, and I think it affects only 16 employees. It seems to me that we ought to do something for these engravers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation, to be fixed by the Secretary of Commerce, of not to exceed $1,600 per annum to each person of clerks in the offices of shipping commissioners, $10,000: Provided, That one clerk may be employed hereunder at a compensation not to exceed $2,200 per annum.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts: Page 24, line 18, after the word "commissioners," strike out "$10,000" and insert "$15,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the estimate made for this work was $25,000. The committee has granted $10,000. I have been over the matter pretty thoroughly with the Department of Commerce and I find it is absolutely necessary for them to have an allowance of at least $5,000 more money, and in all probability that will hardly be sufficient to carry them through to the 1st of July. I think the amendment ought to pass, and I think the point of order can not lie against it.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a communication that I have received from Mr. Chamberlain, the Commissioner of Navigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the matter indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. What is the document referred to? I reserve the right to object.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It is a document from the Commissioner of Navigation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, September 15, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM S. GREENE,
Chairman Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. GREENE: I am very much obliged for your note of yesterday and I shall be glad to come up to see you any time you name. The situation, however, in a nutshell is this:

Congress has voted vast sums to build ships to win the war and you are getting the ships. Our seagoing ships of 1,000 gross tons or over amounted to 1,280 of 4,306,892 gross tons on July 1, 1918; on July 1, 1919, they numbered 2,058 of 7,300,022 gross tons. Besides these, we have 400,000 gross tons, mainly seized German ships, of merchant ships not registered, used as transports. During the past fiscal year 600 of these ships were manned by naval crews aggregating over 100,000 officers and men, according to the Navy, so the shipping commissioners had nothing to do with them. With the return of our troops, these ships are being turned over to merchant service and merchant crews are being shipped and discharged by shipping commissioners. The shipping commissioners can not keep up with the work, and the force, of course, should be increased if you wish the acts of Congress to be administered.

New ships every week make the situation more impossible. I have just given you the shipping total for July 1, 1919. Since then, on September 1, 1919, it has increased to 2,245 ships of 8,100,008 gross tons, and is growing at the monthly average rate of 100 ships of 400,000 gross.

The Shipping Board recruiting force for which you voted $6,250,000, and later a deficiency of $600,000, runs school ships to train officers and men, and pay them during training and all that sort of thing, have nothing to do with the shipment and discharge of merchant crews from voyage to voyage. In no spirit of complaint, I may say that they are paid at considerably higher rates than our services which are statutory, so there is neither economy nor good administration in asking them to do shipping commissioners' work.

The situation with wireless is even worse. Since 1916 the appropriation has remained at $45,000. Then we had only 604 American ships equipped with wireless; on July 1, 1919, we had 2,312, and the number is increasing about 100 a month. During the war this made no special difference for the Navy supplied wireless apparatus—what it could get and spare from its own needs—and furnished operators.

Matters are beginning to be normal; in August, 1919, 1,500 Navy operators were withdrawn from merchant ships quite suddenly and we are doing our best to license competent men to take their places. With the final establishment of peace, which I suppose will come some time, the embargo on land-transmitting stations will be lifted and this work will multiply suddenly also. The inspection work will be harder on account of the great progress in apparatus and methods of radio communication during the war, in which our wireless service men, who volunteered in the Army and Navy, had a big share.

In a word, there is no question of high cost of living or relative salaries in this bureau and elsewhere in the Government or private life involved in the deficiency estimates, as I explained to the subcommittee on the deficiency bill: It is solely a matter of carrying out the laws Congress has itself enacted. The work has more than doubled, and it can not be done without more men and more money.

Sincerely, yours,

E. T. CHAMBERLAIN,
Commissioner.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas press the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not this matter has been gone over by the Committee on Appropriations and approved by the committee?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the committee has taken no action since the bill was reported. A large part of the deficiency estimate was for increase in compensation of the clerks. It is true that they have to have some additional clerks. It is somewhat problematical just what work these clerks will be called on to perform. They have an appropriation of $50,000. It was apparent from the hearings that that would not be enough, but the committee thought by striking out any allowance for increase of compensation and by perhaps a little more efficient methods they could perform all the work that would be thrown upon the clerks by an additional appropriation of $10,000.

Mr. BLANTON. With the exception of one clerk at $2,200, the maximum compensation of all the balance is fixed by this act at $1,600 per annum.

Mr. GOOD. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. Since the chairman thinks that $10,000 is sufficient, is he willing to accept this increase of $5,000?

Mr. GOOD. No; I believe we ought not to increase this.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think it is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am clearly of the opinion that it is not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. That there is no law authorizing any additional employees in this particular department or increase in compensation of any of the employees, and, there being no law and this being a deficiency appropriation bill, clearly the amendment of the gentleman is not in order and is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of navigation laws: To enable the Secretary of Commerce to provide and operate such motor boats and employ thereon such persons as may be necessary for the enforcement, under his direction by customs officers, of laws relating to navigation and inspection of vessels, boarding of vessels, and counting of passengers on excursion boats, $18,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 24, after line 27, insert the following:

"Wireless communication laws: To enable the Secretary of Commerce to enforce the acts of Congress 'to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers' and 'to regulate radio communication,' and to carry out the international radio telegraphic convention, and to employ such persons and means as may be necessary, traveling and subsistence expenses, purchase and exchange of instruments, technical books, rent, and all other miscellaneous items and necessary expenses not included in the foregoing, $20,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be used to increase the compensation of persons employed to enforce wireless communication laws."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, for a number of years we have appropriated $45,000 for enforcing wireless communication laws. The number of vessels equipped with wireless in 1914 was 797. The number of vessels, merchant vessels, now equipped with wireless is 2,235. Many of these vessels during the war have been operated by the Navy Department, and the Navy Department furnished the wireless operators, but now that the Navy Department ceases to operate these vessels, it is necessary for the commissioner to supply the inspectors of the wireless apparatus on these vessels. Besides that, the commissioner makes an inspection under the law of every vessel coming into an American port, even though it is a foreign vessel. The amount that has been suggested in the amendment is the amount which the Commissioner of Navigation advises me is an amount that he thinks he can get along with during the rest of this year, and because of the fact that these inspections now are all made by the Commissioner of Navigation and the inspectors under him, I see no way of avoiding the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For enforcement of the laws regulating the immigration of aliens into the United States, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $263,072.04.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. That item is a very large item, a quarter of a million dollars, and of course is a deficit in last year's appropriation. Is that deficit caused by the cessation of the war and an increase in the number of immigrants coming to this country, or is it due to some other cause?

Mr. GOOD. That deficit is caused by a mistake in the bookkeeping in the department. It is an actual deficiency and was not discovered until about the close of the year, if not until after that. The money has been all obligated and the Government probably received value for it. The amounts are owing to sundry persons, and is a mistake that the department simply admits was made and it is an actual ascertained deficiency.

Mr. HICKS. Then this has nothing to do with immigration?

Mr. GOOD. It was all expended during the year or obligated during the year. They obligated that much more money than had been appropriated for the service. It is a deficiency for 1919.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. I do not have the floor.

Mr. HICKS. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Concerning the point of order, Mr. Chairman—does the gentleman prefer to yield first to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. HICKS. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Under what authority of law do departments create an obligation in excess of the appropriation that has been made by Congress?

Mr. HICKS. I will have to refer the gentleman to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. All I can say is there is no authority at all. They went ahead and contracted an indebtedness under the assumption that they had the money.

Mr. O'DONNELL. The principal cause of the deficiency was a bookkeeping error. We have operated for the last 10 years, ever since we have been upon an annual appropriation, under an allotment system which was devised and perfected with a view to avoiding deficiencies and which has always enabled us to know exactly where we stood. The system is required to be operated by good accountants, but owing to the war conditions there were four men on this desk in one year, and one of the men was a green man. He happened to be the man on the job at the outset of the fiscal year 1919, and in casting up the salary obligations of the service, he in some way made an error of $246,000. In other words, he failed to take up by that much the total salary obligations of the service. That was not discovered until late in the fiscal year, in the month of May, to be exact. It was, of course, too late then to put on the brakes to a sufficient extent to shut off expenditures to a point that would enable us to save such a large amount as that.

Added to that sum, which amounted to $246,000, we were confronted in New York with a particularly cold spring, and the result was that our coal account there ran some $24,000 over the amount that had been set aside for fuel during the fiscal year, and you will see that the total amount of the estimate is considerably less than those two items put together, because we did make retrenchments as far as we could as soon as the mistake was discovered, and succeeded in making up a large portion of the amount.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Was that any excuse for this department sending letters in congressional districts saying that on account of Congress not appropriating money they had to drop employees? As I understand the real excuse was their mistake.

Mr. GOOD. This deficiency is for 1919. I think the letters to which the gentleman refers were sent after——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This year.

Mr. GOOD. And this has no relation to that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. None whatever?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska further.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. It matters not what a bookkeeper may have done in a department, even the division of bookkeeping and warrants would be directly responsible for the last issue of accountable warrants to disbursing officers in excess of appropriations made. The account is stated. No auditor has any authority to state an account in excess of the appropriation made. The division of bookkeeping and warrants and the auditing department should be held directly responsible.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the point of order for the purpose of eliciting some information from the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. The only basis for as much as $246,000 of this item is a statement made by the Secretary of Labor to the effect that a green employee made a mistake in estimating salary obligations that now makes necessary an appropriation as a deficiency this enormous amount. I want to call the attention of the chairman to the following which I read from committee report No. 181, filed July 30 of this year by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY], chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, concerning unreasonable increases in salaries made since the armistice was signed by the Housing Bureau, which is a branch of this Department of Labor, to wit:

On the 1st day of April, 1919, nearly five months after the signing of the armistice, this bureau had over 800 persons on its pay roll, about one-half of whom were at the Washington office and the remaining one-half were scattered over the country.

On the 15th day of June, 1919, more than seven months after the armistice was signed, this bureau still had 341 persons on its pay roll, 228 of whom were at the Washington office and 103 in the field.

With this immense force in the Washington office the bureau has a large part of one of the most magnificent buildings in Washington rented for its use at more than $20,000 per annum.

This bureau has a committee of its own officials whose duty it is to regulate salaries, but it appears that the chief "regulation" in which they have engaged has been the raising of salaries. Since the armistice many salaries have been raised, and here are some of them:

Name.	From—	To—	Name.	From—	To—
Carl V. Badger	$3,000	$3,500	E. E. Jacobsen	$3,500	$4,500
H. D. Belcher	3,500	4,000	Miss H. James	3,600	4,500
C. Birdseye	3,000	3,600	W. C. Lewis	4,500	6,000
C. H. Brewster	4,200	4,800	I. E. Macomber	4,000	6,000

Many other instances could be cited of the profligate expenditure of money by this bureau, but these are sufficient to show the reckless disregard for the interests of the Government with which these salaries have been raised since the cessation of hostilities.

Mr. GOOD. That has nothing to do with this.

Mr. BLANTON. The question I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is this: When is Congress to reassume the constitutional function of fixing the salaries of the officers of this Government itself and not leave it to these many different bureaus of our land? How much of this $246,000 with respect to salaries in this item does the chairman of the committee know, and can he tell us, is embraced in just such kinds of irresponsible, unearned, undeserved raises in salaries, and I understand many of these men in this Housing Bureau are probably $1,200 men, and we find one whose salary has been raised since the armistice, if you please, from $5,000 to $9,996 per year. As above stated, this Housing Bureau is a branch of the Department of Labor, and these unconscionable raises by it in the salaries of its employees had to have the approval of and be arranged by the Secretary of Labor. This Immigration Bureau is also a branch of the Department of Labor, and so far as we know most of this $246,000 shortage in estimates may be due to just such unreasonable raises in salaries in this particular branch of his department, for which the Secretary of Labor should be held responsible.

I think it is time, Mr. Chairman, that this Congress reassumed its constitutional function of fixing the salaries of the officers of this Government. We were told the other day, and given the advice and the information, that in the railroad department there are men drawing salaries as high as $50,000 a year. I think the Appropriations Committee ought to look into these questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to follow the committee in this matter. The committees, of course, give more attention to these things than the ordinary Member of the House, but in view of the fact that here is an item of more than a quarter of a million dollars, due to bad bookkeeping, do you not think before we pass this appropriation there ought to be a special investigation to find out where the fault of this matter lies?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not approve, of course, of the increases in salaries referred to in the article read by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. That is with the United States Housing Corporation. The money for housing was appropriated directly to the President for that purpose and expended by the United States Housing Corporation. Congress never fixed those salaries. It has had nothing to do with them. But the item under consideration ought not to be confused with that item, because I think that the whole Housing Corporation is a poorly managed concern [applause]; that the officers there are not fit to occupy those positions; and their activities chiefly have been to raise their own salaries and the salaries of persons in that corporation. We have taken over already in this Congress the question of appropriating money directly and taking from the corporation to some extent the right to fix those salaries. I hope when the next deficiency bill comes in, when we have time to go into that matter, we may put some limitation on those salaries. But that is not this item. I do not justify this expenditure. I want to say that no man who is an official of the Government ought to permit a green clerk to make a mistake of this kind. The men having charge of the administration of this fund ought to have known where their salary lists would run to. It is altogether inexcusable to throw the question of the blame on a green clerk. I do not justify that excuse.

What is the condition that confronts Congress? Here are 5,000 vouchers unpaid, running all the way from a few dollars up to $1,000. The employees at Ellis Island, numbering 500, have not yet been paid the last installment of their June salaries.

The law places no limitation upon the amount that can be expended for this service. These people—employees and persons who have furnished supplies—have furnished their services and supplies to the Government believing that this branch of the service had the money with which to pay. I think you are not going to punish anyone except the innocent if you strike it out. It is not subject to a point of order, because the Congress has unlimited power to appropriate money, and this department has created an actual deficiency. Therefore we have got to appropriate the money whether we want to do so or not.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The question I asked the chairman to answer was: Does he know that this $246,000 sought to be appropriated in this bill does not cover just such increases in salary since the armistice was signed as have appeared in other bureaus of the Department of Labor? If they are increases in salary and not the legitimate salaries provided for by Congress, then I do not think $246,000 of this item should be allowed. And the further question: I would like to ask that if, as a matter of fact, this estimate of $246,000 was a mistake of a green clerk in that department, as admitted by the Secretary of Labor, then does the chairman know that this estimate itself is not a mistake of some other green clerk, and that probably the other green clerk may have been correct? If there is one green clerk in the department who can make a mistake of a quarter of a million dollars, there might be another green clerk in the same department who likewise could do so.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman has asked his question, I would like to answer.

Mr. BLANTON. It is rather a long question.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; and somewhat involved.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOOD. There may be some increases of salary. I think they are slight. If there are increases they have been recognized and were made before the beginning of the year. So far as there being any increases in salaries comparable with the Housing Corporation increases, I can say to the gentleman that I am satisfied nothing of that kind exists, but that the deficiency is an actual and ascertained deficiency.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. HICKS. I would like to ask the gentleman if in all his Representative experience he ever knew a case before where a clerk forgot his own salary, such as appears in this item?

Mr. GOOD. I imagine this clerk got his own salary. That came out of the legislative bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa have one minute more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHEELER. A resolution was introduced here two or three months ago to investigate the Housing Corporation. Does the gentleman think the House should take favorable action upon that resolution?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know just what investigation is to be made. My own personal belief is that the Housing Corporation, or some other institution, should sell that property just as soon as it can and put the money into the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this actual, ascertained deficiency of $263,000 does not represent any increases of salary that have been paid to anyone. It is simply this, as explained by the Assistant Commissioner of the Bureau of Immigration: In the beginning of the fiscal year 1919 the bookkeeper who had charge of this appropriation, in apportioning the amount appropriated by Congress for the ensuing fiscal year, made a mistake and allowed more than he should have done for the fore part of the year, making an error of $246,000—not increases in salary, but obligations for supplies and other general expenses. As a matter of fact, of this amount only about $20,000 is for salaries, representing the salaries of the employees at Ellis Island for the last half of June.

Mr. LAYTON. In all seriousness I would like to ask whether or not, if we passed this appropriation, we should stop there? Do you not think that, under the circumstances, where more than a quarter of a million dollars has been paid without law, that there should be some investigation as to how it was paid out, who was guilty of the mistake, and punish, by dismissing from the service, those that were responsible?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly if any employee of the Government has been guilty of any misfeasance or malfeasance, of course he should be dismissed and punished, if it appears proper. But here is a situation where the commissioner of the bureau frankly states that a mistake was made, and, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has said, there are accounts unpaid, people who have charges against the Government who are waiting for their vouchers to be cashed. We are confronted here with the proposition of whether or not Congress is going to take care of those legal obligations of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. Is this deficiency to make up for what a clerk failed to report as to the amount of money that would be owing? I understand this clerk in making a computation of figures failed to take into the column certain charges that would have to be provided for here. Is that so, if the gentleman please?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The clerk explains it, and the only explanation he has is this. I do not want to read it again; the gentleman from Iowa has already read it. But I will read it again. It is this:

> Mr. O'DONNELL. The principal cause of the deficiency was a bookkeeping error. We have operated for the last 10 years, ever since we have been upon an annual appropriation, under an allotment system which was devised and perfected with a view to avoiding deficiencies and which has always enabled us to know exactly where we stood. The system is required to be operated by good accountants, but owing to the war conditions there were four men on this desk in one year, and one of the men was a green man. He happened to be the man on the job at the outset of the fiscal year 1919, and in casting up the salary obligations of the service he in some way made an error of $246,000. In other words, he failed to take up by that much the total salary obligations of the service. That was not discovered until late in the fiscal year, in the month of May, to be exact. It was, of course, too late then to put on the brakes to a sufficient extent to shut off expenditures to a point that would enable us to save such a large amount as that.

Mr. BUTLER. If, then, the clerk had made no mistake when this appropriation was made originally, we should make the appropriation now?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; it is an actual deficiency, and the point raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] with reference to the salaries paid by the Housing Corporation has absolutely nothing to do with this item.

Mr. BUTLER. It has nothing to do with this item, but it has a great deal to do with the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not deny that, but it is foreign to the matter under consideration.

Mr. BUTLER. It does not fit here or fit properly anywhere else.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I want to see if I have the situation correctly in my mind. Is this a case where the money has been actually paid out?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Or is this a case in which the money is owed, and they did not allow for it and account for it, and it is needed now to pay existing obligations?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is a case where in the outset the bureau spent more money than it was authorized to spend under its own allotment system. Now it finds itself in the position of having thousands of vouchers due and no money with which to pay them.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Was that money spent in the proper direction?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It was spent, as I understand it, in the employment of the persons who were employed to carry on the business of the bureau in the field.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Without regard to that expense, there now exists proper claims against the Government for which provision must be made?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly; and unless Congress makes provision, these people with these lawful claims will not be paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee this question: Were all these salaries to be provided for under lump-sum appropriations?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. The appropriation is made in the form of a lump sum.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Then when the lump sum was exhausted was there any legal liability on the part of the Government as to that which was unpaid?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman probably knows more about the legal liability of the Government than I do, he having served as an auditor for a number of years; but I take it that the necessity was upon the bureau of continuing its work with reference to immigration.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I want to reach the point in regard to legal liability that has been assumed in the discussion of this question, and for the purpose of ascertaining that I desired to know whether it was a lump-sum appropriation out of which these salaries were paid. If so, the liability of the Government ceased when the amount appropriated was exhausted. If the Congress fixed statutory salaries for the people in that service, a liability would run for the fixed salary under the statute. If the salary ran under an annual appropriation, when that appropriation ceased the liability of the Government ceased. In this question there is a creation of a liability by that department, not by any inexperienced clerk, not by some subordinate who shall be made the goat of this case, but by the officer directly responsible for the management of that business, who has deliberately sought to impose upon the Government a liability to the amount of $263,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Two hundred and forty-six thousand dollars.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Without warrant of law for so doing, and there is no authority whatever in the law, as I understand the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee and the statement of the chairman of the committee, for the creation of a liability against the Government.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I take it that the gentleman does not take the position that in a case where services have been rendered to the Government by innocent parties in good faith they should not be paid.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That is a question of a claim that should be considered with penalties for the man who created the liability without warrant of law.

Mr. Chairman, this simply uncovers a line of practice that will be utilized whenever there is an opportunity to utilize it and a department finds itself in the midst of embarrassment. It is nothing uncommon for Government officers to send forward an account to be audited by the auditing officers for the allowance of claims and certification for appropriations under the act of 1887, and under that act many officers for years have gone forward and drawn out of the Treasury on certificates of settlement hundreds of thousands of dollars beyond appropriations made by Congress.

The point I want to emphasize is this: Is Congress going to fix the limit of appropriations? If so, let it see to it that an investigation of this matter be carried to the point of fixing the liability of the man at the head of the office that made this mistake, and hold him and all others strictly to the amount appropriated, and then let them come in due time with their estimates for a deficiency.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Tennessee, if I may have his attention. The total appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, for this bureau was $2,450,000, was it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is correct.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And the total amount that was overappropriated by means of the alleged mistake of some "green clerk" was $246,000, so that one-tenth of the total appropriation to this bureau has been overexpended, due, as it is claimed, to the alleged mistake of some "green clerk."

Can the gentleman explain how it was that the head of the bureau did not find out about this great overexpenditure until May of the fiscal year ending on the 1st of July?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not. The head of the bureau stated that it was necessary to have the best kind of an accountant to make this allotment, and the only explanation he offered was that on account of the war they had had during the fiscal year four different men at work upon this particular matter at different times, of course. Now, one of them, as he said, happened to be a green man, not accustomed to or experienced in this work, and he is the man who happened to be in charge of it at the beginning of the fiscal year, and who made this mistake through a bookkeeping error.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What I can not conceive of is the head of the bureau permitting a mistake of that kind to be made and not finding it out until two months preceding the close of the fiscal year.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Does the gentleman know whether or not the head of this bureau was attending to his business, or whether he was out on some other matter of a personal nature?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have no knowledge of that fact, I am sorry to say. Now, may I also ask this question of the gentleman from Tennessee: There was very little immigration to this country during the period of the war. I am unable to understand why during the period of the war, and with very little immigration, there should be any need of an overexpenditure of one-tenth of the total amount allotted to the bureau.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As the gentleman knows, the Bureau of Immigration has something to do besides its work in connection with the immigrants actually coming to this country.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I appreciate that fact.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The work has been greater than ever before in the matter of making investigations concerning aliens living in this country during the war. The gentleman knows that quite a number have been deported as a result of the work done by the Bureau of Immigration.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I submit that on account of conditions growing out of the war, and the necessity of seeing that these aliens in this country conducted themselves properly and in accordance with our laws, an increased burden was put upon this bureau. The gentleman must not confuse the work of this bureau with the simple work incident to immigrants coming in from day to day, because it is much greater than that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But during this period was not substantially the same force employed and maintained at Ellis Island that was employed and maintained there previous to our entry into the war when immigration ceased?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will allow me, my recollection is that for immigration work the appropriation was not as large as it was in previous years.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does the gentleman know how much it was cut down?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; I have no recollection of it, and am not going to try to recall now. If the gentleman will take the last sundry civil bill he can get the exact figures, which will show how much the reduction was.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Minnesota yields the floor, I should like to be recognized. I see no reason for any great argument about this item. The facts are that this $2,450,000 was appropriated. The statement of the representative of the department is that a bookkeeper made a mistake in making the allotment, and allotted more than the $2,450,000. They do not divide the amount equally for each month. They often allot for the first few months of the year a larger sum than for later months in the year, and in May it was ascertained that this mistake had been made. As a result they were then confronted with the necessity of stopping all the work of the department or of proceeding and putting this matter up to Congress. The representative of the department states that when he discovered the mistake he immediately attempted to retrench, in order to try to avoid, if possible, asking for this amount, but he could not do it. As a result, the employees at Ellis Island have not received their salaries for the last half of the month of June. Because of the cold spring they had to buy additional fuel, and the bills for that fuel have not been paid. In addition to that, other bills contracted in order to run the station for the last few months were not paid, and the question now comes to the Congress whether we will pay those bills or refuse to pay them. It is not our mistake. It was a mistake of that clerk, but we are not freed from the responsibility, it seems to me, of appropriating this money in order that these clerks may be paid and these unpaid bills settled.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; not until I finish this statement. I do not know what the attitude of the chairman of the committee is. So far as I am concerned, if the Congress does not want to pay it, I am willing to let these clerks go to the Court of Claims and get their money. I know there is nobody on this side of the House or on the committee who has any interest in it at all. If Congress does not want to appropriate this money to pay these bills, why just vote it out.

A MEMBER. And repudiate the bills!

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas withdraw his point of order, or make it?

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw it. I do not think it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield now?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If my time has not expired, I will be glad to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has not yet expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Did the head of the bureau inform the committee just how and where this additional 10 per cent had been expended?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. He stated it in this way, that $20,000 of the item was for salaries, that there were 5,000 vouchers to be paid in varying amounts, of from a few cents up to $1,000, that the fuel item was $24,000, and if the gentleman will look at the hearings he will find the different items as stated by the representative of the bureau, but there was no itemized statement filed.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That was the amount that he found he was short at the end of the year that he could not take care of?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But were there increased expenditures during the year which absorbed this $246,000?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; I am satisfied from his statement that there were no such increased expenditures. As I understand the statement, there was a mistake made in the allotment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TINCHER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes in order that he may answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I remember when this bill was up in the House and an amendment was offered providing that no part of this appropriation for this department should be paid to the man in charge at Ellis Island, I think his name was Howe. I believe he has been removed.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. He is out.

Mr. TINCHER. Is he the man that was supposed to have anything to do with these figures?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; this was a mistake of the bookkeeper.

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman think there was any intent on the part of these officials to underestimate their needs and then to bring in a deficiency bill?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Oh, no; the disposition is always to overestimate but never to underestimate.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman says that this man Howe, at Ellis Island, has been removed.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; I understand that he resigned.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina have one minute more. I want to ask him a question in connection with his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Following the course that has been stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, I gather that this is the situation: That allotment was made for this bureau for expenditure, and the original error on the part of the official was in advising the bureau that it had more money to expend than really had been appropriated to them.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That they had more money to spend than the actual appropriation?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes, and the expenditures were made in good faith, with the idea that they had that money to their credit.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No doubt about that.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But later on it was discovered that they did not have so much money appropriated.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It was discovered that the clerk had made a mistake.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from South Carolina have one minute more in order that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAYTON. Why take this poor, green clerk and lay the blame on him?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I have not taken him in the first place.

Mr. LAYTON. Where is the disbursing officer and where is the auditor? They are there to see that the appropriations are not exceeded. That is their function.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman said that he wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. LAYTON. That is the question I want to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has again expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so not for the purpose of laying the blame on some poor, green clerk, but placing the responsibility right where it belongs. No man charged with the responsibility that the Commissioner of Immigration is charged with and having at his command two and one-half million dollars is fit to occupy the position who does not observe the plain provisions of the law. [Applause.]

This gentleman who has been traveling about over the country making speeches ought to have guessed a little nearer to what the requirements of his service were. [Applause.] The provision of law is that he shall make his allotments by months or quarters so that there will be no deficiency at the end of the year. And then the law provides that any person violating any of the provisions in this section shall be summarily removed from office and may also be punished by a fine of not less than $100 or by imprisonment of not less than one month.

I want to say to the executive officials whose duty it is to enforce and obey that law that they will have some obligations staring them in the face if they ever come again before the Committee on Appropriations with a mess like this, and then attempt to throw it all on some poor, green clerk. Before I shall vote again to pay out money that has been expended in excess of the appropriation in rank violation of the law I shall demand that the provisions of the law be enforced and the officer removed and punished in accordance with the law. [Applause.]

Mr. LAYTON. Why not do it now?

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Not to exceed $25,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for "Expenses of interned aliens, 1917–18," is continued and made available for expenditures incurred by the Immigration Service for interned aliens during the fiscal years 1919 and 1920.

Mr. MOONEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOONEY: Page 27, line 19, insert as a new paragraph:

"Miscellaneous expenses, Bureau of Naturalization: For compensation, to be fixed by the Secretary of Labor, of examiners, interpreters, clerks, and stenographers, for the purpose of carrying on the work of the Bureau of Naturalization, provided for by the act approved June 29, 1906, as amended by the act approved March 4, 1913 (Stat. L., vol. 37, p. 736), and May 9, 1918 (Stat. L., vol. 40, pp. 542–548, inclusive), including personal services in the District of Columbia, and for their actual necessary traveling expenses while absent from their official stations, including street car fare on official business at official stations, together with $4 per diem in lieu of subsistence, and for such per diem together with actual necessary traveling expenses of officers and employees of the Bureau of Naturalization in Washington while absent on official duty outside of the District of Columbia, telegrams, verifications of legal papers, telephone service in offices outside of the District of Columbia, carrying into effect section 13 of the act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stats., p. 600), as amended by the act approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 765), and in accordance with the provisions of the sundry civil act of June 12, 1917; and for mileage and fees to witnesses subpœnaed on behalf of the United States (the expenditures from this appropriation shall be made in the manner and under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe): Provided, That no part of this appropriation or of any appropriation hereafter made for the Bureau of Naturalization shall be available for the compensation of assistants to clerks of United States courts (acts June 29, 1906, vol. 34, p. 596, sec. 1; Mar. 4, 1913, vol. 37, p. 736, sec. 3; May 1, 1913, vol. 38, p. 1, sec. 1; May 9, 1918, vol. 40, pp. 542–548, secs. 1–3; July 19, 1919, vol. 41, p. 222, sec. 1), $268,600."

Mr. MOONEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe if the condition that confronts the naturalization department was known to the members of this committee this reservation of a point of order would not be made and the amendment would be accepted. At the outbreak of the war it was discovered that we were not one Nation but many nations living together, and patriotic citizens everywhere became unusually active for an Americanization program.

Coming, as I do, from one of our most cosmopolitan cities, I can testify to the enthusiasm of the membership of the Americanization council and value of the work they did. Yesterday this council in my city was addressed by the great governor of our great State, the mayor of Cleveland, and the superintendent of our schools.

All of them are enthusiastic in the work. The great value of it is recognized everywhere there. We have found that our foreign-born people welcome the opportunity to learn. They love our country and our institutions, and are clamoring for citizenship, 99 per cent of them. I submit that the record they made throughout the war entitles them to consideration now, and gentlemen who have not been active in this work can not realize the delays and disappointments that have come because of lack of funds in this department, which has been more than self-supporting. There is in my district one city ward where at this moment 1,100 Jugo-Slavic people, as loyal as may be found anywhere and as good men as you can find anywhere, are waiting for their final examination. They can not be examined because the bureau has been reduced from four examiners to one, because of lack of funds. There are in the city 8,000 persons ready to be naturalized. They are being naturalized at the rate of 150 persons a week. It is not a very encouraging outlook to hand to the students in these schools. It does not give us very much right to preach to these students that it is a duty and a very great privilege to secure citizenship, and that the Government welcomes them. I hope the gentleman will consider this delay and permit the amendment to pass.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOONEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. What is this money to be used for?

Mr. MOONEY. Very largely for examiners, and for help, to avoid delays in the department, both in Washington and in the various naturalization stations.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Naturalization examiners?

Mr. MOONEY. Yes. I hope the amendment will be accepted; it is important. I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a letter from one of my friends, himself foreign born, a very high type of patriotic citizen, who has taken a leading part in this work in Cleveland.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

AMERIŠKA DOMOVINA,
Cleveland, Ohio, July 26, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES A. MOONEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MOONEY: I would like to call your attention to the Americanization proceedings which at present prevail in Cleveland. It is becoming unbearable on us teachers. I had a naturalization class of 678 pupils during the last six months. It was the largest class of its kind in the country. The fellows visited the school regularly and very eagerly learned not only the necessary things about the Constitution and laws, but I taught them history, geography, and common ways and habits of the American people. Their education in the old country was very badly neglected, and most of them could hardly sign their own name, but you ought to see them to-day when they answer you promptly such things as, What is the Monroe doctrine? Where and when was the first permanent colony established in the United States? What is the stamp act? Who invented steam, telephone, and other modern conveniences? What is the name of the presiding judge of the United States Supreme Court? What happens when the President vetoes a bill? How old must be a citizen to be elected Congressman? Tell the names of the 13 original States? Who became President after Lincoln was killed? etc. In order to bring up these fellows you must have some patience and good will, but they are very thankful when they see that we care for them. But it seems to me that the Government is not doing its part toward Americanizing the aliens. I will give you some examples of the proceedings now in practice: According to law, when a man files his petition for citizenship papers, 90 days must elapse before he is admitted to citizenship. But it takes a year nowadays. All those aliens who arrived in this country after June 29, 1906, must first apply for a certificate of arrival with the Commissioner of Naturalization in Washington. I wrote myself over 1,000 of such applications during the last five months. The Commissioner of Naturalization in Washington has the habit to withhold the applications for six or seven months instead to answer in seven days. I have over 400 pupils who sent in their applications for a certificate of arrival in February and March, and still they are waiting for a reply. Here is one hot example: In January, 1919, one John Jenic sent in his application for a certificate, and as he did not get any answer until April 22, 1919, I wrote in his name, on April 22, to the commissioner to explain why such a long silence. And the answer to this letter, written on April 22, just arrived in Cleveland July 25, saying: "We are in receipt of your letter asking us regarding your certificate of arrival. Owing to the insufficient force in our office, we beg to say that we can not consider your application at the present time, and you will be notified in due time about your certificate of arrival." The poor fellow might wait another year for an answer.

Still another bad example of the proceedings of naturalization: A citizen lost his citizenship paper, and he made a report in the court where he obtained his citizenship. They advised him to write to the Commissioner of Naturalization in Washington for further details. After a long wait he received an answer, saying that on account of war he can not get a duplicate of citizenship. Is that honest? Is that just? He was, in my opinion, illegally deprived of his citizenship for no other fault than on account of loss of papers. He could take the matter to the court, which would compel the commissioner to issue a duplicate, but he heard it will cost him some money to fight it out, so he let the matter drop, and to-day he is without any rights, and even can not get better work, being an "alien," as he can not produce his citizenship paper. With matter of this kind and others I have to deal every day—induce the people to patience, run around the courts, advising, helping, writing complaints, etc.

And the best part comes now. There are in Cleveland over 8,000 applicants for citizenship. From my school alone there are over 700. And God alone knows when they will be naturalized. We used to have in this city three or four naturalization examiners who expedited the proceedings quite satisfactorily. After July 1 three examiners lost their positions on account of Congress not appropriating funds for the continuation of their office. One lone examiner now handles the crowds daily besieging his office. And as the courts can not examine more than about 150 applicants for citizenship in one week you can imagine what chance the fellows have to become citizens. There are over 8,000 of them.

Talk about Americanization, better citizenship, learning English, alas, yes; all this is very fine and sounds beautifully, but when you come and practice what you preach there are put unsurmountable obstacles in the way of an alien with noble character and earnest wish to become an American citizen. You, gentlemen of Congress, do not know of these conditions as you do not come into contact with thousands whose most earnest wish is to become citizens. We mingle daily wth them, know their wants, their hearts, their honesty and loyalty toward this country, and I think it very proper to confide these conditions to you in order to obtain whatever help is possible. Do not drive honest people from you, from these beloved United States, extend a willing hand to help them along. A man that is educated is not a very apt object of Bolsheviki propaganda, but the uneducated, forgotten, not-taken-care-of element among the aliens falls as easiest prey into the fangs of Bolshevism with its kind, alluring words, promising so much, which, of course, can never become reality, but, nevertheless, is working upon the minds of the forgotten and uncared for who follow words and not deeds.

I am sure you will be interested in this matter and will gladly give information which you can depend on, as it comes from experience.

Thanking you for your patience, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

LOUIS J. PIRZ, Editor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Mississippi on the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to argue it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. This service has usually had about $275,000. For this year the amount is $450,000. If the Chair will observe the amendment he will note that it is not offered to supply a deficiency but is offered as a supplementary appropriation. If the Chair will also notice the provisos in the amendment he will see that it attempts to change existing law. For example, I read from the amendment:

Hereafter that no part of the appropriation or any appropriation hereafter made for the bureau—

And so forth.

It goes beyond the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made and seeks to enact general legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. MOONEY. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to modify the amendment by striking out the part to which the chairman of the committee objects.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, before the Clerk reads, is it in order now to offer an amendment on page 27?

The CHAIRMAN. To what paragraph?

Mr. LAYTON. To the paragraph under the head of the Department of Labor—the first paragraph.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, it is not in order. We have passed that.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to that for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent to return to the paragraph in order that he may offer an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOONEY] has been asking recognition of the Chair. He desires to modify his amendment and reoffer it with the objection eliminated that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The first thing to dispose of is the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what is the nature of the amendment that the gentleman desires to offer?

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to strike out the figures "$263,072.04," so that this House may have an opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The Chair has already ruled upon the point of order, and if the gentleman from Ohio wants to offer another amendment, he is in order.

Mr. MOONEY. I desire to offer a substitute amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Ohio desires to modify his amendment, I ask unanimous consent that this paragraph may be passed over temporarily in order that the gentleman may have that opportunity, to be returned to later.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, what became of my request to return to page 27 for the purpose of offering an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The request has been submitted and objected to. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MCFADDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7709) to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum, not exceeding $75,000, for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric-light and power plant and for the construction of a public-school building.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 4) relative to the printing of hearings and report of the committee on brewing and liquor interests and German propaganda and Bolshevik propaganda.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Legislative.—House of Representatives.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 10, after the words "House of Representatives," insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"To pay the widow of J. Willard Ragsdale, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina, $7,500."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an additional paragraph, to pay to the widow of JOSEPH P. THOMPSON, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma, the same amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, to follow the amendment just reported: To pay the widow of JOSEPH P. THOMPSON, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma, $7,500.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the two amendments at once? If not, they will be so considered.

There was no objection.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For stationery for Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, $210.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of making a statement that affects the membership of the House. I dislike very much to call attention to the fact that some Members of the House are falling into the habit of conducting a portion of their correspondence by telegraph at the expense of the United States. I intended to read some samples of certain telegrams, but have decided not to do that. Speeches are practically sent out by telegraph that convey information which it is not necessary to convey in that way. During the war it was necessary for Members to use the wires very frequently, and in some instances to cable to France in matters affecting the soldiers, their release, sickness at home, and things of that kind. Nobody complained about that. A few have fallen into the habit in some cases of sending telegrams with regard to private business and charging it to the Government. Some Members are falling into the habit of sending telegrams and then saying to the person, "Wire me at my expense." The person answers by wire, but instead of it being at the expense of the Member it appears finally at the expense of the Government of the United States. Now, unless we can become sane and sensible with regard to this matter, there will have to be some regulation as to the sending of these telegrams. A telegram that is sent by a Member ought to be couched in as few words as he would couch a telegram if he paid for it out of his own pocket.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. Does not the gentleman think that the statement that he has made is a very excellent reason for voting against this appropriation?

Mr. GOOD. Which appropriation?

Mr. REAVIS. This disposition on the part of any Member of this House to conduct his private business at the expense of the Government ought to be exposed to this House, that those who do not indulge in the practice ought not to rest under a charge of that kind.

Mr. GOOD. Well, I will say to the gentleman that the chairman of the Committee on Accounts [Mr. IRELAND], when he saw how these bills were running, made a rack giving each Member a pigeonhole wherein are placed the telegrams that are sent by the membership of the House, so that Members can go over them. Sometimes Members are not to blame. Their secretaries send telegrams and sign the Member's name. They are not always to blame, and they can now find out just exactly what is being charged to the Government because of their business.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand that these telegraph bills are audited by the Committee on Accounts of this House, are they not?

Mr. GOOD. That is true.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is it not the duty of the Committee on Accounts to audit those bills, and where they are not strictly official to require the Members sending them to pay them out of their own pockets? [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. I think that is done, and I will say to the gentleman now that my attention was called to a telegram the other day that cost, as I recall, about $3.50 or $4. The Member commenced by stating that "I said on the floor of the House the other day," so-and-so, and that this was "a principle that ought to be enacted into law," and so on. Now, that related to Government business; it was not in regard to private business; but, of course, it had no place in a telegram and ought not to have been sent.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And would not have been sent if it had to be paid for out of his own pocket.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. HICKS. When I was a member of the Committee on Accounts I know our policy then was this: The clerk would go over all the telegrams received and charged to Government account. Whenever in his opinion, backed up by the chairman of the committee, it looked like a personal telegram, we then sent to the Member and asked for the payment of that telegram.

Mr. TEMPLE. If the gentleman will permit a further question. Is not a Member required to indorse upon the telegram the statement that it is official business?

Mr. GOOD. Yes, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. TEMPLE. Now, if a Member should do that and it is not official business, the remedy lies precisely where the former chairman of the Committee on Accounts indicates.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that perhaps I overstated the matter in regard to telegrams that relate to business that is not official. The trouble is that the big expense comes in the telegrams which in a sense relate to official business and yet contain matter that in the end could just as well be sent by letter. I think perhaps if we would sort those telegrams out we would find that there are very, very few of those that are charged to the Government that do not fall within Government business.

Mr. TEMPLE. There ought not to be any.

Mr. GOOD. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Let me suggest to the gentleman that we have a remedy now, if the Committee on Accounts will do its duty. I happened to be a member of the Committee on Accounts at one time, and I recall very distinctly that we gave considerable offense to Members of the House by refusing to pay for telegrams they sent on official business and which we determined was not official business. And we also excluded a number of telegrams and compelled the Members to pay for them where we thought they could as easily have been sent by letter. I want to suggest to the gentleman that the attention of the Committee on Accounts ought to be called to this fact by this committee, and give them to understand that they must do their duty or the House will undertake it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I may be mistaken, but I have been informed by the members of the Committee on Accounts that it has never been the policy to exclude a telegram for its length or its cost if it related to public business. Many of these telegrams that cost so much money do refer to Government business. Some cablegrams have been sent to France costing $50 or $60, and I do not think any Member would object, and I do not object to that. Some of them detailed a condition in such a way that the soldier might be advised, but the trouble is that care is not taken in couching a telegram in a few words, instead of making it just a running, conversational telegram.

Mr. GARNER. That could be remedied, I think, by the Committee on Accounts itself, if it would call it to the attention of the Members who sent these various telegrams that contain a great many more words than necessary, and the various Members sending those telegrams, I think, would soon desist. What I am complaining of is that the Committee on Accounts is not going to the extent that it might go.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman stated that cablegrams were sent to France costing a large sum of money. I had the impression—I do not know whether it is correct or not—that there was an agreement with the foreign Governments that all governmental matters should go over the cables to France without cost to this Government.

Mr. GOOD. That may have been true before the wires were taken back, but the chairman of the Committee on Accounts advises it is not true now.

Mr. REAVIS. I am satisfied that such an agreement did prevail during the time the Government controlled the wires.

Mr. GOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have made this statement in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, who is temporarily called out of the city and who wished to make it himself; but I only want to emphasize this fact, that we ought not to put up to the chairman of the Committee on Accounts or the Committee on Accounts this question at all. Every Member ought to decide it himself. While we are asking every executive department of the Government to reduce expenditures and reduce estimates, we ought to practice that same degree of economy ourselves. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa have two minutes more. I want to make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HICKEY] is recognized.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this very important piece of legislation, but for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to one of the most important incidents that has transpired in all history. The other day on this floor the people's Representatives paid fitting tribute to that splendid American and masterful soldier, Gen. John J. Pershing, who led our armies to victory over in France. To-day we have as guests in the House gallery two young men of the famous First Division, who so ably and gallantly supported the cause of America and the Allies n the battle fields of France. These young men are from my district, from the city of South Bend, Ind. Sergt. Alex. L. Arch was privileged to fire the first shot for the American forces in the Great World War. [Loud and prolonged applause, the Members rising.] This was on the morning of October 23, 1917. The other soldier, Corpl. Louis J. Varady, was his able assistant. [Loud and prolonged applause, the Members rising.]

It affords me great pleasure, indeed, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, to be the Representative of a district that can furnish and did furnish such a splendid contribution to the Great World War. [Applause.]

I thank you, gentlemen, very much for giving me this opportunity of bringing this to your attention, and I thank you very much for the courtesy you have shown to my two brave soldier constituents. [Loud applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The unexpended balance of the appropriation of $50,000 for furnishing additional rooms in the House Office Building, contained in the public resolution approved October 24, 1913, is made available for additional office equipment for such of the rooms of that building as may be necessary on account of the appointment of additional clerks to Members.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to a condition which exists in the House Office Building restaurant. That restaurant ought to be abolished. [Applause.] If it were, it would not be necessary to appropriate $40,000 or $50,000 for the purpose of preparing additional rooms. It would release five good rooms to the membership of this House.

I do not speak for the Members of this House in condemning the House Office restaurant, but I speak for those for whom this restaurant was established—the secretaries, clerks, and other employees of the House, who can ill afford to pay the enormous and outrageous charges that are inflicted there. I have nothing to say about the restaurant below this Chamber. The Members patronize that, but I understand that both of them are run by the James brothers. [Laughter and applause.]

I want to call your attention just briefly within the time I have to some of the charges made in this magnificent and palatial restaurant. They are charging for a plate of ordinary thin soup, 15 cents. It can be bought at Wallis's or at Childs's restaurant for 10 cents, and you can ride upon the New York Central Railroad, at a speed of 50 miles an hour, in a palatial dining car, and pay 20 cents for it.

Chicken pie, made principally of carrots, 75 cents. Some of you have tasted that composition. At Wallis's you pay 65 cents, and on the Pennsylvania Railroad, 75 cents.

Beans, that great article in which we all so delight, 25 cents for a small handful of poorly cooked beans, without any pork. [Laughter and applause.] At Wallis's the price is 15 cents, and at Childs's restaurants 10 cents, and on the New York Central Railroad only 5 cents more than they charge in this restaurant, or 30 cents.

Browned potatoes, 20 cents; anywhere else, 15 cents and 10 cents.

A chicken sandwich, a cold, deathly cadaver, 40 cents in the House Office restaurant, and if you want it heated it is 5 cents extra. On the Pennsylvania Railroad it is 35 cents.

Coffee is 10 cents. A bowl of milk is 25 cents. One ear of corn, 15 cents. And, in addition to that, they insist on charging 15 cents for a package of smoking tobacco that you can buy anywhere else for 10 cents.

Now, they pay no rent. They buy no linen. Whether they wash it or not, I do not know. The lights are free, and the help practically works for nothing, at a mere small pittance of $5 per week. Think of it! We are raising the pay of everybody on earth and these poor fellows work for $5 a week. Why? Because they collect the balance off the poor girl stenographers and men stenographers and clerks that have to go there because they can not find any other convenient place. The balance of it is collected off them.

I do not know who has charge of this matter. It is not a political matter, gentlemen. I am not drawing the party line on this. It is a matter in which we are all vitally interested. But I do say this, that somebody in authority in this House, if we are not absolutely palsied legislatively, ought to look into this very simple proposition. The railway brotherhoods came here a few weeks ago and rapped upon the doors of this Congress and they said they wanted so and so. I really interpreted that to mean that they wanted us to wake up on the question of the high cost of living. The Congress was not to blame. But the House ought to look into this matter in addition to appropriating this money.

Recently the professoriate met in the city of Washington and decided that they would subject the people to philosophical and psychological treatment, and they started that "back to the basket" movement in the city of Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Who has control of this restaurant?

Mr. KING. I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I am informed that the Speaker of the House has control.

Mr. KING. I do not think so, because I think if he had he would remedy it. I would be glad if the gentleman would call attention to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The gentleman does not indorse the giving of all of these privileges to a concern that charges these prices?

Mr. KING. Not without reducing the price 50 per cent. It was not the intention of Congress to allow this profiteering under this roof.

Well, as I said, they started this "back to the basket" movement here in the city of Washington. Not only that, but they began to lecture the people and grab the people, the common people, and say to this man and to that man, "You are living so extravagantly. Stop buying so recklessly in the markets." The very night that statement was made I saw a poor old lady down in a grocery store making some of these "extravagant" purchases. She purchased a nickel's worth of cheese, and one egg, and one tomato, and a small loaf of bread, and one thing and another like that, making a total purchase of 73 cents, and she threw down a dollar bill and put the change in her pocket. Do you want to feed the people on psychology or philosophy? [Laughter.] The first duty of a Republic is to feed its people, and the first duty of Congress is to start right here in the Capitol Building and in its own Office Building and clean up its own mess. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Samuel Robinson, William Madden, Joseph De Fontes, and Charles C. Allen, messengers on night duty during the Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, for extra services, $700 each; in all, $2,800.

Mr. MOONEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 27, line 19.

Mr. GOOD. I will ask the gentleman to withhold that until we finish the bill. Then we can return to it.

Mr. MOONEY. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved March 1, 1919, is amended by adding at the end of the first paragraph thereof the following additional proviso: "Provided further, That no employee of the Federal Government shall, for services in the Philippine Islands, receive additional compensation under this section at a rate which is more than 2 per cent of the rate of the total annual compensation received by such employee."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the figure "2," at the end of line 16, and insert the figures "20."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 29, line 16, strike out the figure "2" and insert the figures "20."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 29 insert, after line 18, the following:

"SEC. 3. That the Bureau of Efficiency is directed to investigate the scope and character of the statistics needed by Government and the methods of collecting, compiling, and presenting statistical information by the several executive departments and independent Government establishments, and submit to Congress its report and findings, together with such recommendations as it deems proper."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, one of the reasons for the increase in Government appropriations and expenses is the fact that we have so many different departments of the Government doing the same character of work, so far as statistics are concerned. For example, about 10 different agencies of the Government are collecting information on the consumption of coal. Eight different agencies are collecting information on the distribution of coal. Six different agencies are collecting informaton on the exports of coal, and the same number on imports. We had nine different agencies collecting information on the price of coal.

Now, something ought to be done to bring practical sense to bear upon the methods of collecting statistical information. They are all available. I fear that the trouble with them is that so many different agencies are collecting them that we do not get them as completely and reliably as we would if we had but one agency of the Government collecting all statistical information and all the other agencies needing this information going to that one for the information thus collected. This amendment authorizes the Bureau of Efficiency to investigate this matter and report.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not true that the ordinary Member of Congress, including myself, would need three or four expert clerks to utilize all this immense accumulation of figures?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, I believe three or four would not be sufficient. I think it would take a great many more than that. I have here a large volume, an index of the statistics that are gathered by the different Government agencies, compiled by the central bureau of planning and statistics. As the gentleman from Illinois well said, the statistical information is so scattered that when a Member gets the index he is confused to know to which of a dozen different places in the Government he should go in order to get the information he wants.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I want to cite one example in support of this amendment. Some years ago the Treasury Department was tabulating statistics in regard to consular-sealed goods. Two different bureaus were making similar tabulations. One bureau showed that in a given year the volume of consular-sealed goods that entered the United States was $30,000,000. Another bureau showed $42,000,000. They were tabulating from two different standpoints; but a person who did not know that fact would see two tabulated statements with a difference of $12,000,000.

I think the point of economy here is one of the most important and practical that can be singled out, to create one uniform agency for the tabulation of such statistics.

Just one word more. When the war was on I chanced to be in conversation with one of the statisticians from the National Council of Defense. One evening he came in quite weary with the day's work. He seemed greatly troubled. I said, "What is the trouble to-day?" He said, "We have been trying to find out how many different factories there are in the United States that manufacture leather, and how much they manufacture, and what kinds." I said, "What do you expect to accomplish by that?" He said, "Oh, we will need to know how much leather the Army will need, and how much the Navy will need, and where the leather can be found, and how the supply will correspond with the demand."

I said, "Do you suppose the War Department has ever had occasion to make an inquiry in regard to leather heretofore?" He said, "Yes; perhaps so. I will make some inquiry about that." He was a man who had been in the department work but a short time. He came back the next night grieved more than ever. In the course of that day somebody had discovered the very point involved in this amendment, and they began to draw away from the National Council of Defense a large number of these agencies and try to concentrate them at one point so that one agency would collect the information, and others desiring that information would go to that agency to get it. That will give uniformity, accuracy, and economy, and this amendment will go a long distance in that direction.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 3.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the figure "3" after "section" be changed to "4."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimouse consent that section 3 may be numbered as section 4. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return now to page 27, at the end of line 14, so that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOONEY] may be reoffered.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done. That was agreed to when we passed it before. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOONEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOONEY: Page 27, line 19, insert as a new paragraph:

"Miscellaneous expenses, Bureau of Naturalization: For compensation, to be fixed by the Secretary of Labor, of examiners, interpreters, clerks, and stenographers, for the purpose of carrying on the work of the Bureau of Naturalization, provided for by the act approved June 29, 1906, as amended by the act approved March 4, 1913 (Stats. L., vol. 37, p. 736), and May 9, 1918 (Stats. L., vol. 40, pp. 542–548, inclusive), including personal services in the District of Columbia, and for their actual necessary traveling expenses while absent from their official stations, including street car fare on official business at official stations, together with $4 per diem in lieu of subsistence, and for such per diem together with actual necessary traveling expenses of officers and employees of the Bureau of Naturalization in Washington while absent on official duty outside of the District of Columbia; telegrams, verifications of legal papers, telephone service in offices outside of the District of Columbia; carrying into effect section 13 of the act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stats., p. 600), as amended by the act approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stats. L., p. 765), and in accordance with the provisions of the sundry civil act of June 12, 1917; and for mileage and fees to witnesses subpœnaed on behalf of the United States: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for the compensation of assistants to clerks of United States courts (acts June 29, 1906, vol. 34, p. 596, sec. 1; Mar. 4, 1913, vol. 37, p. 736, sec. 3; May 1, 1913, vol. 38, p. 1, sec. 1; May 9, 1918, vol. 40, pp. 542–548, secs. 1–3; July 19, 1919, vol. 41, p. 222, sec. 1), $268,600."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is legislation on an appropriation bill. The trouble with this estimate is that it was prepared as a sort of composite of the lump-sum appropriation in the sundry civil bill and the specific appropriation carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I have not examined the amendment closely enough to point out all the defects, but, for example, the general appropriation in the sundry civil act should not authorize an expenditure for clerks in the District of Columbia. The law is that no money shall be expended in the District of Columbia for personal services, except that which is specifically authorized. The provision for clerks in the District of Columbia is carried properly in the legislative bill and not in the sundry civil bill. The gentleman includes in this amendment a deficiency for personal services in the District of Columbia not authorized by law. And I think there are others. The whole amendment was prepared in the department as a composite of the two, and therefore carries legislation, and a great deal of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard?

Mr. MOONEY. I have nothing to say further than I said before.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WELTY. I wish the Chairman would reserve the point of order for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WELTY. On the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WELTY. The point raised by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is not germane to this amendment. There is no legislation in what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOONEY] has offered. It simply takes care of a deficiency which the gentleman contends is not a deficiency, but the fact of it is that last year this Congress appropriated $675,000, while the appropriation bill of this Congress carried only $450,000. Now, I know it is the sense of this Congress not to appropriate any money that is unnecessary, and I would not want a penny of unnecessary expenditure to be made. But, gentlemen, let us look at the situation and what this provides. Congress, in the first place, can say where the money shall be spent—whether it shall be spent in Washington or outside of the city of Washington. I do not think there is anything to that proposition. There may be one matter that comes under the Holman rule, and I thought the gentleman would invoke that rule. But when Congress failed to appropriate enough money to carry out an existing law, that itself creates a deficiency. This Congress appropriated only $450,000, while the Sixty-fifth Congress appropriated $675,000, thus the Bureau of Naturalization was required to dismiss 167 clerks.

What has been the result. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOONEY] said, in Cleveland alone 8,000 aliens are waiting for certificates because they can not be delivered. The other day the Naturalization Commissioner notified me that in New York alone 15,000 applications are on file and can not be looked after, while in the offices in Washington there are about 10,000 applications not acted on, because they do not have a sufficient number of clerks. What else have you? During the war the Sixty-fifth Congress passed an act——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the debate be confined to the point of order.

Mr. WELTY. I am speaking to the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. No; the gentleman is discussing the merits.

Mr. WELTY. I do not think I am discussing the merits of the bill.

Mr. GOOD. I am quite sure the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. WELTY. I do not think the gentleman from Iowa even raised a point of order. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on this proposition. During the Sixty-fifth Congress a law was passed permitting every alien who became a soldier under our flag to become a naturalized citizen of this country. It required machinery to do that. There are 40,000 returned soldiers who are not permitted to receive the certificates because of a lack of appropriation.

Mr. GOOD. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I claim that a deficiency has been made because the amount that was appropriated at the time the bill was passed was not sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman as to whether or not this amendment is a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. WELTY. I may say that it is a deficiency, because when we enacted a law making every one of these soldiers capable for citizenship we made a contract which was binding on the Government when he volunteered, but now there are 40,000 of these soldiers who can not get their certificates, because we do not have clerks sufficient to care for these matters.

Mr. GOOD. That has nothing to do with the point of order.

Mr. WELTY. If that is not a deficiency I do not know what is. Congress enacted a law declaring that the soldiers should become citizens if they enlisted and then did not provide the funds to make them citizens. Forty thousand of these soldiers have returned; there are 10,000 applications in Washington now, and the bureau can not take care of them. They only have two clerks to receive these applications, which come in 800 a day. I maintain that when Congress enacted the law granting soldiers citizenship, permitting them to make application, and then not providing appropriations for the machinery to make them citizens nor to issue the certificates, is really creating a deficiency.

I maintain that I am arguing the proposition. I maintain that the lack of appropriation created the deficiency, because the law was enacted during the Sixty-fifth Congress, and now we are bound to care for these men in accordance with the act. Otherwise we are not true to our obligations we made at the time when we declared that they should be citizens of the country. We are not issuing certificates, because there is no appropriation to take care of them. The deficiency was not declared by the Bureau of Naturalization, because the appropriation was not sufficient to take care of these matters, and they dismissed 167 clerks, and therefore they are unable to take care of these matters now.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order that I made and that is that this is legislation on an appropriation bill. I do not know what he is talking about.

Mr. WELTY. I am sorry the gentleman from Iowa is so dense that he can not understand plain English language. It is not legislation, but provides for an appropriation to care for this deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, since reporting the bill the Secretary of War has written a letter to the chairman of the committee asking a change of wording on page 9, line 18. I therefore ask unanimous consent to return to page 9, line 18, to correct the language in accordance with the request of the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to return to page 9, line 18, to make a correction. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, line 18, strike out the words "for rental of quarters" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For rent of buildings." After the word "Columbia," in the same line, insert "for the use of the War Department."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to make any further statement except to say that this is the request of the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think a little later on in the afternoon there may be an opportunity for some discussion, but I think we ought to proceed and dispose of this bill.

Mr. PLATT. I want to speak in reference to some remarks made by the chairman of the committee at the opening of the consideration of the bill. It would have been in order really earlier in the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman should make his remarks a little later in connection with another measure. I think this bill ought to be passed now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming object?

Mr. MONDELL. I shall not object if the chairman of the committee does not.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Wyoming that a few moments ago when we were about to rise because of a lack of fodder to go in the machinery, I promised the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] that I would not object, and I do not intend to object now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr Chairman, I object.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9205 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendments and bill to final passage.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized. He is in charge of the bill.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask this question? Is there no chance to offer a motion to recommit this bill?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; but not at present. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. LANKFORD, Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, and others rose.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask a separate vote on the amendment striking out the provisos on pages 16 and 17 of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from California has covered what I desire, but what I want is a separate vote on the amendment that strikes out the proviso against prosecuting farmers' cooperative associations.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, there are two provisos. The amendment strikes out the two provisos.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee I ask for recognition——

The SPEAKER. There can not be any recognition. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the Speaker says there can not be recognition——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not be recognized for debate at this time.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Certainly; and the gentleman did not say that he did not desire to be recognized for debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state why he desires recognition.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. When the Speaker asked if a separate vote was desired on any amendment, I asked for recognition for the purpose of asking a separate vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] striking out both provisos. I do not know whether the gentlemen who have been recognized have asked for a separate vote on the amendment that strikes out both provisos. In any event I ask for a separate vote on the Fess amendment striking out those provisos.

Mr. NOLAN. That was my request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that a separate vote has been demanded on the amendment striking out those provisos. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the vote will be taken on the other amendments en gross. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, in the Committee of the Whole an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] to the first proviso, which is included in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] striking out the proviso. In other words, before the provisos were stricken out the first proviso was amended. Subsequently the gentleman from Ohio moved to strike out both provisos. The parliamentary inquiry is this: If the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio should not be sustained by the House, what would be the effect then upon the amendment which was adopted offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The SPEAKER. There would be no effect, because the failure of the Fess amendment would reinsert the language as amended in the bill. The question is on the amendment as to which a separate vote was asked by the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN], and the Chair will ask that that amendment be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 23, after the figures "$200,000" strike out the colon, insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the paragraph down to and including line 9 on page 17.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the part stricken out may be reported to the membership of the House, so that they will know what is before the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the language stricken out.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization other than an organization of public officers, or any individual other than a public officer, for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof, not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment striking out the language just reported.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on that amendment, and pending that I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that he withhold his demand for a moment until the House has divided, at which time he can obtain what he desires.

Mr. BLANTON. Very well, I withdraw it for the present.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Obviously there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 30, nays 201, answered "present" 1, not voting 197, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report it——

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. LAYTON. I am opposed to that part of the bill that I wish to strike out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his motion.

Mr. LAYTON. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report it back forthwith without lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, on page 27.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LAYTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back forthwith with an amendment striking out on page 27, lines 11, 12, 13, and 14.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the lines asked to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the enforcement of the laws regulating the immigration of aliens into the United States, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $263,072.04.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Delaware to recommit the bill.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. GOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PRODUCTION AND DISTRIBUTION OF FOOD PRODUCTS AND FUEL.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8624, disagree to all Senate amendments, and ask for a conference without instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8624, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference without instructions. Is there objection?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the question of there being no instructions made was brought up yesterday and objection was raised to it then. I would like some understanding as to whether or not, before unanimous-consent agreement is reached, if any discussion on any of the amendments can be had?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will ask that an hour and a half be set aside for discussion, with the understanding that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] have 40 minutes and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] 10 minutes. What time does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] desire?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand it, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] asks unanimous consent, as he has stated, and he couples with that a request that after unanimous consent has been granted and the bill has gone to conference there may be discussion as has been suggested?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is not my understanding, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HAUGEN. Let it all be coupled in one agreement, with the understanding that we have an hour and a half of debate.

Mr. TREADWAY. I object, Mr. Speaker.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CLARK of Missouri, until Thursday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. HAWLEY, for one day, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, September 22, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8461) granting a pension to Louisa C. Southerland, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

MONDAY, September 22, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, from the beginning of our national history we have committed our way to Thee. The voice of prayer has always been heard in our councils of State. In a time of crisis Thou hast been with us. Thy right arm has gotten us the victory. Thou hast brought us through a great conflict to victory. We come to Thee praising Thy name, and recommitting ourselves to Thee, and praying that in the days before us, with the ever-increasing weight of responsibility resting upon us, we may have the guidance of the God of our fathers. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I have received two or three copies of a telegram which I send to the desk and ask to have read. I wish to say also that I know a number of copies of the same telegram have been received by other Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read, without objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., September 18, 1919.

JAMES E. LILLY,
1920 North One hundred and eleventh Street,
Indianapolis, Ind.:

Crisis at hand; will determine whether America joins league of nations or forsakes allies and negotiates separate peace with Germany. Vote for any reservation may require resubmission and endanger treaty. Will you join 95 others in giving $1,000 each to League to Enforce Peace, William Howard Taft, president, for immediate use in arousing country to demand prompt ratification in form that will not send treaty back for urgent negotiation and delay? World pacification matter very urgent.

GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM.
CLEVELAND H. DODGE.
VANCE MCCORMICK.
OSCAR S. STRAUS.
HERBERT S. HOUSTON,
Treasurer, Bush Terminal Sales Building, New York.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, it will be observed that the gentleman to whom this telegram was addressed is asked if he will be one of 99 to subscribe $1,000 each for the purpose of proselyting in favor of the league, and so on. The reply which they got from this particular gentleman was somewhat disconcerting to them, but the point I make is that since the treaty is now before the Senate it would be interesting to know just what particular disposition is proposed to be made of so large a sum as is called for by these telegrams, just what it is that these gentlemen expect to do with so large a fund to be expended in the behalf and in the interest of a proposition that is now before the Senate of the United States.

an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $35,000 required for the expenses incident to the approaching industrial conference to be held in the city of Washington, D. C. (S. Doc. Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have received resolutions adopted at a joint convention of the Lithuanian Roman Catholic Federation on August 18–22, 1919, at Worcester, Mass., explanatory of the little-understood situation in Lithuania. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"The following resolutions were adopted by the representatives of the Lithuanian National Council, Lithuanian Roman Catholic Federation of America, Lithuanian National Fund, Lithuanian R. C. Association of Labor, Lithuanian Total Abstinence Association, Lithuanian R. C. Women's Association, and Lithuanian Press Association in joint convention with the Lithuanian R. C. Federation on the 18th to 22d of August, 1919, at Worcester, Mass.

"We Americans of Lithuanian descent, having the interest, well-being, and future development of the Lithuanian Republic at heart, believing fully in her aspirations and sympathizing entirely with her suffering, have adopted the following resolutions:

"'Whereas Lithuanians are a distinct and separate race in Europe, neither Slavic nor Teutonic; and

"'Whereas Lithuania has declared her absolute independence and separation from Russia; and

"'Whereas Lithuanians of East Prussia have declared their independence of Germany and they have resolved to become an integral part of the Lithuanian Republic; and

"'Whereas the Lithuanian Republic is and has been administered during the two past years by officials chosen by the people, and the Government is functioning satisfactorily: Therefore be it

"'Resolved, That Lithuania be recognized as an independent nation; and be it further

"'Resolved, That the present Government of the Lithuanian Republic be recognized by the United States of America; and the president of this convention is directed to send a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States and to the peace conference in Paris.

"'Whereas Bolshevism is a danger to the democracies of the world; and

"'Whereas this danger can be suppressed or isolated by force and arms; and

"'Whereas Bolshevism uncombated may extend beyond its present limits; and

"'Whereas the armies of the Lithuanian Republic under the leadership and direction of Gen. Zukauskas have successfully maintained an active front against the armies of Lenin and Trotski; and

"'Whereas the Lithuanian Republic is handicapped in its laudable campaign through a shortage of food, clothing, medical, and military supplies; and

"'Whereas the need of military supplies and equipment in particular is imperative and immediate if the defense is to be continued successfully; and

"'Whereas the Lithuanian Republic by opposing Bolshevism is benefiting Europe, the United States, and the whole of mankind: Therefore be it

"'Resolved, That the Government of the United States negotiate with and furnish to the Lithuanian Republic necessary food, clothing, medical supplies, and military equipment.

"'Whereas the Lithuanian Republic after her declaration of independence elected a president and proceeded to function as a government, holding the confidence of the citizens of Lithuania and controlling almost all of ethnographic Lithuania, and a commission was sent to the peace conference in Paris to protect the interests of the Lithuanian Republic; and

"'Whereas the presence of this commission in Paris was known to the various representatives at the peace conference through the presentation of various documents supporting Lithuanian claims, and the chairman, Prof. A. Valdemar, of the Lithuanian commission, was received by the official delegates of the different countries represented in Paris, including Mr. Henry White, one of the five representatives of the United States; and

"'Whereas the peace conference made certain decisions seriously affecting the future of the Lithuanian Republic and her territory without considering the opinion of Lithuania's representatives, for example:

"'1. The river Niemen, which flows through purely Lithuanian territory, has been internationalized.

"'2. A temporary line of demarcation has been declared by the peace conference in Paris between the Lithuanian Republic and Poland, and the peace conference directed that hostilities cease in that territory, and this line benefits Poland, because it permits Polish armies to remain on purely Lithuanian territory and it gives Poland a free hand to carry on her propaganda.

"'Whereas making the river Niemen (Memel) free opens up a new object for future international misunderstanding, especially with Poland; and

"'Whereas Lithuanian representatives were not heard nor were their opinions considered in these very vital decisions: Therefore be it

"'Resolved, That the representatives of the United States to the peace conference in Paris take notice of the evident injustice done to the Lithuanian Republic and that they try and obtain a hearing before the peace conference for the Lithuanian Republic in these premises; and be it further

"'Resolved, That the attention of the Senate of the United States of America is called to the injustice above referred to, especially the internationalization of the river Niemen (Memel), and that they modify the treaty of peace by making the river Niemen purely Lithuanian, subject to the administration and control of the Lithuanian Republic.

"'Whereas the peace conference at Paris has taken cognizance of the existence of the Lithuanian Republic; and

"'Whereas the peace conference through Marshal Foch directed that a temporary neutral line of demarcation be maintained between Lithuanian Republic and Polish Government; and

"'Whereas the Lithuanian Republic has respected the suggestion of the peace conference; and

"'Whereas the Polish Government has ignored the peace conference suggestion; and

"'Whereas the Polish armies instead of fighting Bolshevism are invading the territory of the Lithuanian Republic; and

"'Whereas this invasion has extended far beyond the temporary line of demarcation suggested by the peace conference: Therefore

"'We Americans of Lithuanian descent solemnly protest against the overt acts of hostility by the Polish Government made against the Lithuanian Republic; and

"'We further protest against the presence of Polish troops upon Lithuanian territory: Therefore be it

"'Resolved, That the Government of the United States use her influence through Congress and the peace conference in Paris to the purpose of having Poland cease in her acts of hostility in Lithuania: Further, That Poland withdraw her forces to the line of demarcation already established; and be it further

"'Resolved, That the Government of the United States is represented to convey her disapproval of the above acts to Poland and the peace conference in Paris with the insistence that the wrongs above referred to be remedied at once.'

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have also received a communication from the secretary of the National Federation of Religious Liberals relative to the league of nations, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD. Accompanying the communication is a report of the proceedings of the ninth congress of the federation, which I ask may be referred with the communication.

The communication and accompanying report was ordered to lie on the table, and the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF RELIGIOUS LIBERALS,
Newton, Mass., September 4, 1919.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senator from Massachusetts.

DEAR SIR: I am instructed by the council of this federation, which officially represents the union for common ends of the Societies of Progressive Friends, the Unitarian and Universalist Churches, and congregations of Jewish Reform in the United States, besides many individual religious liberals, to ask your courteous consideration of the action taken by it at its late session at Longwood, Pa., a printed copy of which I herewith transmit to you.

The expression of opinion in favor of an early ratification by the Senate of the treaty of peace with Germany without amendment, save such interpretations as may further explain our American understanding of it, was ardent and unanimous. We trust we may find your senatorial judgment coinciding with this view of our international obligations as a people.

I remain, very truly, yours,

CHARLES W. WENDTE, Secretary.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I present a memorial from the League for the Preservation of American Independence, praying for the adoption of certain reservations in ratifying the treaty of peace with Germany, together with a statement signed by 150 citizens of Massachusetts and other States approving the stand taken by that organization. I ask that the body of the memorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FREEDOM TO DEFEND A RIGHT; FREEDOM TO REFUSE TO FIGHT; FREEDOM TO MIND OUR OWN BUSINESS.

To the Senators of the United States:

The League for the Preservation of American Independence respectfully urges the careful and dispassionate consideration of the following:

I.

We affirm:

1. That no treaty obligations should be assumed which impair—

RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE.

(1) The right of self-defense and of friendly succor.

RIGHT TO REFUSE TO FIGHT.

(2) The right to refuse to go to war.

RIGHT TO MANAGE DOMESTIC AFFAIRS AND TO MAINTAIN MONROE DOCTRINE.

(3) The right to manage our own domestic affairs and to maintain our traditional policies.

ALL THESE RIGHTS DESTROYED OR IMPERILED BY THE COVENANT.

2. That the right of self-defense and of friendly succor is destroyed by article 15 of the covenant; that the right to refuse to go to war is destroyed by article 10 of the covenant; and that the right to manage our own domestic affairs and to maintain our traditional policies is imperiled by articles 16, 21, and 23.

AMENDMENT NEEDED, NOT INTERPRETATION.

3. That if these provisions of the covenant were good but obscure, they would require interpretation, but that as they are vicious and clear, what they need is amendment.

II.

CONSENT TO BE GIVEN SUBJECT TO SPECIFIC RESERVATIONS.

We therefore submit:

1. That the Senate should refuse to advise and consent to the making of the treaty with Germany unless its advice and consent is expressly made subject to such reservations as the Senate shall specify. According to established international usage, acceptance by the other parties signatory of such reservations can be accomplished by the separate action of the several chancelleries without either reconvening the peace conference or jeopardizing the stability of the peace with Germany.

RECONVENING OF PEACE CONFERENCE NOT NECESSARY.

2. That when consent has thus been given to the treaty the Senate should maintain its reservations even if other powers hesitate or decline to approve them, and should not under any circumstances yield to pressure exerted from abroad.

THE UNITED STATES MUST NOT YIELD TO FOREIGN POWERS.

3. That the reservations to be made by the Senate in giving consent to the treaty should include the following:

THE RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE.

First reservation: The United States expressly reserves its right to resort to war in self-defense or for the restoration of order in a neighboring territory or to succor a friendly nation, even if such action is disapproved by the unanimous vote of the council or of the assembly; such an exercise of sovereignty by the United States not to constitute a breach of any covenant or obligation under this treaty and not to subject the United States to any of the consequences prescribed therein in the case of disregard of covenants, anything in the treaty to the contrary notwithstanding.

THE RIGHT TO REFUSE TO FIGHT PRESERVED.

Second reservation: The United States expressly reserves its right to ignore a call to arms from either the council or the assembly and to refuse to adopt any military, naval, financial, or economic measures against any nation or nations except such as its uncontrolled judgment shall approve, anything in the treaty to the contrary notwithstanding.

THE RIGHT TO REGULATE DOMESTIC AFFAIRS AND TO MAINTAIN THE MONROE DOCTRINE PRESERVED.

Third reservation: The United States expressly reserves its right to determine its own domestic policies and to enforce its own regulations for the control of immigration and of its own coastwise trade and to formulate and enforce its own fiscal and tariff policies, and in particular the United States reserves its right to act in accordance with the Monroe doctrine with the same freedom and effect as if this treaty had not been made.

Respectfully submitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection it will be so ordered.

GRAZING LANDS IN UTAH.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 3016) to authorize the disposition of certain grazing lands in the State of Utah, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 214) thereon. I present in connection with the bill a favorable report from the department. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905 (Public, No. 212), as limited the sale of Indian lands in the former Uintah Indian Reservation, in Utah, remaining undisposed of five years from the taking effect of the act to disposition in tracts of not more than 640 acres to any one person be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and such lands shall remain subject to disposition as provided by law, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That where the validity of purchases heretofore made under the act of March 3, 1905, have been or may hereafter be questioned in any departmental or court proceedings on the ground that a larger area than 640 acres has been, directly or indirectly, acquired by one person or corporation, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in his discretion, to accept a reconveyance of the lands involved in such proceeding and to repay to the purchaser or his assigns the purchase money paid therefor, or to validate, ratify, and confirm such sales, or to examine and determine the present value of said lands and upon payment by the patentee or purchaser or his assigns of the difference between the amount heretofore paid and such ascertained value, to validate, ratify, and confirm such sales.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the report may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report submitted this day by Mr. SMOOT was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 3016):

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3016) to authorize the disposition of certain grazing lands in the State of Utah and for other purposes, having had the same under consideration report favorably thereon without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

This bill proposes to remove the limitation of 640 acres as a maximum purchase on all future sales, leaving the lands to be disposed of as otherwise provided by the act of 1905 (33 Stats. L., 1069), under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. It would be for the best interest of the Indians to remove this restriction in the interest of obtaining better prices for their lands, because the land is of such character as to be worthless in small tracts, while larger areas will afford an opportunity for use for grazing purposes.

The bill has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, as will appear by the letter attached, which is made a part of this report.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of your letter of September 18, 1919, requesting an expression of my views on S. 3016, "A bill to authorize the disposition of certain grazing lands in the State of Utah, and for other purposes."

This bill appears to be a substitute for S. 2769, concerning which I submitted a favorable report on the 21st of last month. The present bill amends S. 2769, to the extent of adding after the word "sales," in the present draft of the bill, line 7, page 2, the following:

"To examine and determine the present value of said lands and upon payment by the patentee or purchaser, or his assignees of the difference between the amount heretofore paid and such ascertained value, to validate, ratify, and confirm such sales."

I see no objection to the amendment, and recommend that Senate No. 3016 receive the favorable consideration of your committee.

Cordially, yours,

F. K. LANE, Secretary.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
United States Senate.

STRIKE OF STEEL MILL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CURTIS. On behalf of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] I offer a resolution, which I ask may go over under the rule.

The resolution (S. Res. 188) was read, as follows:

Whereas a strike of the employees of the steel mills of the United States has been called; and

Whereas such strike adds to the troublesome conditions already existing and becoming a question of great public moment; and

Whereas it is the duty of Congress to investigate the causes and purposes of said strike and see if the situation can in any way be relieved by Federal action: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor of the United States Senate is hereby instructed to immediately investigate said strike and report to the Senate within the shortest possible time the causes and reasons therefor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I give notice that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] will call up the resolution to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule and be printed.

RACE RIOTS AND LYNCHINGS.

Mr. CURTIS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 189), which was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Said subcommittee shall have power to have meetings in any part of the United States, to call and examine witnesses, to examine papers and to take such action as may be necessary to secure the facts.

PRICE OF WOOL.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram which I have received from Mr. W. A. Snyder, of Denver, Colo., representing the woolgrowers of the Western States, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

DENVER, COLO., September 21, 1919.

LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We have advices from London that the British Government is going to ship 50,000,000 pounds of their wool to Boston and sell same at public auction in November. If England is allowed to do this, it is going to demoralize prices on wool, not only for present clip which is stored in Boston but also next year's clip. I have taken this matter up with all our western growers, and they are unanimous in the opinion that England should not be allowed to use United States as dumping ground for her wool, and it will be appreciated by every grower in this western country if you will use your best efforts to block England's game. The high cost of living agitation that is going on in the country has been directed principally at the meat industry, and prices have declined on both cattle and sheep to such an extent that every grower that is marketing his stuff at the present time is losing money; and we feel we are entitled to some protection on our wool for at least one year to come. United States has 684,000,000 pounds of wool on hand, which is ample for all requirements. The producer of live stock is entitled to reasonable protection, and if it is not given production is going to be curtailed—the very thing nobody wants to see.

W. A. SNYDER.

ARTICLE BY M. F. O'DONOGHUE ON STRIKES.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have a short article from The Chief, a civil-service employees' weekly publication. It is written by Mr. M. F. O'Donoghue, a respected and faithful employee of the Government Patent Office. It relates to the subject of strikes by Government employees and others, and it contains so much good sense and patriotism in this day of strikes and threatened strikes that I ask for its publication in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"STRIKES" OF ALL KINDS MUST GO AND AMERICANISM RULE AGAIN.
[By M. F. O'Donoghue.]

"'Coming events cast their shadows before' is a line from one of Walter Scott's poems. I have foreshadowed some events in The Chief that have come to pass. I make another prophecy. Put down upon the tablets of your memory, 'The strike must go.' Not the policeman's strike alone; not the civil servants' strike alone; but every and any form of 'strike.' The 'strike' will follow the saloon. It was the offspring of the saloon. The men who backed the 'saloon' went with it. The men whose strength is in the 'strike' will go out of existence with the 'strike.' Why will the 'strike go?' Because it's wrong! Because it's inhuman! Because it's selfishness personified! Because it's un-American! Everything that is un-American will go, or will be eliminated from American soil. The danger of the 'strike' came to a climax in Washington when the commissioners were told that only privates of the force would be permitted to become members of the union. The members of the committee were then catechised about this rule, why it had been adopted, and if it would not be changed to allow the officials and higher officers of the department to become members of the union. They were informed that the rule would not be amended.

"Now, you have the whole thing in a nutshell. There had been a policemen's association. The chief of police had joined it. Then there was a 'union' affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, but he would not be permitted to join that. Here was the quintessence of Bolshevism: 'Only privates of the force would be permitted to become members of the union.' Are we in Petrograd or in Washington, D. C.? Is this a dream or a figment of the imagination? No! My friends, it is a stern reality. It is a deliberate attempt to substitute the Bolshevism of Trotski and Lenin for the Americanism of Washington and Lincoln. The members of the union had their opportunity when Police Commissioner Brownlow ordered them to resign from the union. Those who delayed a moment branded themselves as disloyalists. The officers of the American Federation of Labor had the same opportunity. They should at once have insisted that the police association dissever itself from the American Federation of Labor as reliable guardians of the law and loyal Americans.

"We must and we will perpetuate the American system of order regulated by law. Those who are not prepared to adhere to that program must go out of the United States of America or they will be driven out or incarcerated. Every man, woman, and child will have his or her day in court, and they must abide in the consequences.

"Retirement is in abeyance. Now that the N. A. L. C. has reelected its former officers, there may be something doing. These men are experienced, able, and discreet. They are above all things conservative, which goes a long way in these times. The radicalism that was tolerated during the war has run its course. It is on the down grade. The common horse sense of the average American is manifesting itself."

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, during the last three weeks I have received a large number of copies of resolutions emanating from the various Democratic county organizations in my State, including also the State executive committee of the Democratic committee of Colorado, requesting me to vote for the treaty including the league of nations in its present form. I replied at length to the communication received from the State executive committee, but the others have become somewhat numerous, too numerous, in fact, to admit of the time necessary to make a similar communication to each. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a copy of my letter of September 4 to Hon. Philip Hornbein, chairman of the Democratic State executive committee, of Denver, Colo., which will enable me to answer in this manner all the correspondence I have on the subject.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 4, 1919.

To the Hons. PHILIP HORNBEIN (chairman), GERTRUDE A. LEE (vice chairman), G. B. MCFALL (secretary), JOHN H. MITCHELL, WATT G. SHELDON, JOHN W. MALONEY, W. H. GATES, and A. W. GRANT,
Members of the Democratic State Executive Committee,
Denver, Colo.

GENTLEMEN: I am in receipt of your resolutions indorsing the covenant of the league of nations, deploring efforts made by the opposition to belittle and embarrass the President, and requesting me "to exert every effort to bring about the immediate ratification of the league of nations without reservation or amendment," which I have read with due appreciation of its recitals.

In replying to this resolution I shall assume, and I hope with your approval, that it is not partisan, although emanating from a party committee. The proportions of the subject are international in their scope and operation; their stupendous importance to us, to posterity, and to the world lift it far above the limitations of party organisms. Efforts have been made to confine it to that narrow and sordid plane, and many hope that it may become an issue of the next national election. I trust not, but if it should become such an issue, popular sentiment will destroy existing party lines and create new political divisions, charged with possibilities of danger to our institutions and ill equipped for the formidable tasks now within the horizon of our future.

The covenant of the league of nations consists of 2 of 15 parts and 67 of 441 articles of the treaty negotiated at Versailles on June 28 last between 27 allied and associated powers, including the United States and the new Government of Germany. Three of these powers were born of the travail of the war just ended. The operation of the covenants of this treaty upon us will be neither individual nor partisan, but national. Our attitude toward the treaty should be national also. It is an old, and I trust a true, saying that we are partisan within our geographical boundaries and are Americans beyond them. The truth of this aphorism now approaches the supreme test, and it will be a sad hour for our country if it does not survive the ordeal.

I am fully aware that some eminent Republicans, of whom Senator BORAH is an example, insist that the covenant of the league not only should be, but is in fact, a party issue. I know, too, that much of the opposition to it is inspired by partisan motives, and Republicans have no monopoly of this attitude, for many Democrats are similarly disposed in the other direction. But the wisdom of the mass, too obviously resentful of this tendency, will effectually check its general acceptance.

Since I entered public life I have affiliated with and recognized the obligations of the Democracy, but I have never for a moment permitted any party consideration to influence my judgment in the exercise of the treaty-making power, and so long as I remain in the Senate I never will.

Lest I have misapprehended the character of your resolution, however, I must add just here that while I concede the right of your committee to officially advise me as to all matters of a party nature, I am unable to acknowledge its extension into other domains of public duty. Hence I shall treat your communication as embodying the view of eight of my esteemed friends and fellow citizens and reply to it in similar fashion.

I do not know how many of you have read the treaty nor how familiar you may be with its terms. Several times I have read and pondered over its many and complicated covenants, and my task is still incomplete. Indeed I have done this so long and so anxiously that some of my constituents reproach me with being unable or unwilling to reach definite conclusions through timidity, vacillation, or some equally ignoble impulse. But I have been actuated at all times by the very earnest desire to support the treaty by squaring its provisions, if possible, with the dictates of duty and of conscience. This task I have been unable to accomplish.

If the league, when established, would function as so confidently asserted by its supporters, many of whom are not familiar with its provisions, I would accept it. But if it does not, and I fear it will not so function, the reaction among these very supporters will justly make us the first objects of their condemnation, since ours was the responsibility of final action.

The President in his New York address last March declared that the league would be so woven into the general fabric of the treaty that it would be very difficult to separate it therefrom. That has been done. Hence one must familiarize himself with the entire document or he can not intelligently comprehend the nature and probable operation of the league. My opinion is that this is a victor's treaty, a treaty of force, a treaty of punishments, a treaty of partition, a treaty burdened with conditions accepted by the vanquished only at the point of the sword. Doubtless Germany deserves its punishments and much more, but the treaty is nevertheless freighted with a ghastly cargo of future wars, only awaiting opportunity for their bloody development. Germany, like France before her, will submit to her burdens only so long as she must. Both herself and Russia are excluded from the league. It now seems probably that she can and will control that great but suffering nation in the near future, and operate within her vast dominions unhindered by any treaty limitations. Russian Bolshevism means, and has always meant, German activity in Russia.

Through Lenin she has acquired ownership of a majority of Russian manufacturing equipment. The population of the two countries is fully 250,000,000, more than twice that of Great Britain, France, and Italy, and equal to the combined population of these three countries and the United States. And we have antagonized all elements in Russia by a hesitant and ineffective policy, obnoxious to the present dominant class, and deservedly unsatisfactory to the rest of the Russian people. Poland, Czechoslovakia, and the Balkan States are bitterly resentful of the boundaries prescribed for them, some of which must be hereafter defined by plebiscites. Moreover, they are populated by composite but conflicting races, whose bloody collisions have been occasionally avoided in the past by a dominating authority now wholly removed. Italy has no intention of abandoning her demand for Fiume, nor is Jugo-Slavia less determined to retain it. Italy clashes with Greece in Albania and Asia Minor, while France and England even now look askance at each other from their vantage points in Syria and Palestine. Across the Pacific the Shantung problem looms large and sinister. All these situations with others of minor import lurk in the treaty; their outlines scarcely concealed by the elaborate phraseology of its ponderous recitals. Roumania has just defied the authority of the allied and associated powers, overrun Hungary, and arrogantly refuses to surrender a foot of its occupied territory. Hungary must be protected by the Allies if protected at all, and that seems impossible, except by armed intervention.

Do you see any prospect of restoring normal conditions here by merely settling the international problem of the league? Or that when one of these storms breaks from three to five thousand miles distant from America, the burden of their suppression under the league must fall upon us because ours is the only great power still possessed of the financial and military sinews of war? And do you believe the public sentiment of our countrymen will approve our entry into any such war waged upon other continents than ours, to settle differences wholly alien to our hemisphere? Speaking solely for myself, I can not perceive the wisdom of ratifying a treaty pregnant with strife and conflict, and hoping to avoid them by intertwining its articles with covenants for a league of nations. This is possible only to an alliance offensive and defensive, equipped actually and potentially with power to enforce its mandates. I know, of course, that the new and the Balkan nations, save Bulgaria, are to be members of the league, yet Italy, Roumania, and Bulgaria are approaching an entente, sure to be countered by similar action between Greece and the Serbian confederation. Europe can not change the habits nor control the propensities born of experiences centuries old. Her ways are not our ways, nor her purposes our purposes. Peace has been an interlude with her. With us it is a normal state. Her memories are of war and the punishments they have inflicted, of wrongs endured, of hates engendered, of reprisals hoped for. Ours have not yet been darkened by shadows such as these. Her exaltation upon the close of the war and after years of awful sacrifice, with the menace of Germany behind her, was spiritual and supreme. But it was only transient. That has gone. It subsided months ago and her ancient attitude has emerged from its effacement. It is reflected in every line of the treaty, save the covenant of the league, and the President secured that upon terms which must have been abhorrent to his ideals as they are repugnant to his sense of justice.

I can not review specific objections to the plan of the league without expanding this reply to tedious proportions. But I will send to each of you the speech I delivered in the Senate on August 22 upon the provisions of part 13, which I trust you will do me the honor of reading. Some of my friends have advised me that it was not a good party speech. It is not a party speech at all, nor one involving a party or even a strictly national problem. If my construction of part 13 is wrong, I feel sure some of the advocates or opponents of the league will say so to the country and establish the fact by cogent and conclusive arguments. No man will be more greatly relieved than myself should this be done.

Part 1 has been materially changed since it was first given to the public. These changes have greatly improved it, but others are still essential. Even Mr. Taft, its foremost unofficial advocate, now concedes the fact. Those which I shall advocate relate to articles 1, 10, 11, and 21, and to part 13, the reasons for which have been discussed so much and so frequently that I am sure you are already familiar with them.

The league in one or two very important particulars fails to measure up to the President's requirements for a successful covenant. For example, Mr. Wilson said, on January 22, 1917, that—> mere agreements may not make peace secure. It will be absolutely necessary that a force be created as a guarantor of the permanency of the settlement so much greater than the force of any nation now engaged, or any alliance hitherto formed or projected, that no nation nor probable combination of nations could face or withstand it. If the peace presently to be made is to endure it must be a peace made secure by the organized major force of mankind.

No such organized force stands behind this league. It does not embrace half the world's population.

On September 27, 1918, the President said:

> Economic rivalries * * * have been the prolific source in the modern world of the plans and passions that make for war. It would be an insincere as well as an insecure peace that did not exclude them in definite and binding terms.

May I say that the proposed league does not exclude them in definite and binding terms, or at all? The sole reference to the subject is found in article 23, clause (e), which is confined to the congress of members of the league. The President recently told the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations that this clause did not conflict with the control of members of the league over their economic legislation.

In the same address the President said:

> That price [of a secure and lasting peace] is impartial justice in every item of settlement, no matter whose interest is crossed; and not only impartial justice, but also the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are dealt with. That indispensable instrumentality is a league of nations formed under covenants that will be efficacious.

Need I here do more than mention Shantung, whose disposition can not be reconciled with this indispensable requirement?

On January 22, 1917, the President said:

> A victor's terms impressed upon the vanquished * * * would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest, not permanently but upon a quicksand.

This is the eloquent expression of an eternal truth.

The President has also said that a league of nations must be a league of democracies and devoted to the principle of popular government; that it could not admit of association with autocracy, which could not be relied upon to keep faith with its associates, and which would become a nest of intrigue, eating away the very heart of the league. But Japan, the one surviving autocracy of the world, is to be a member and one of the most important members of this league, and with a controlling vote in the proceedings of the executive council. I indorse all these utterances of the President as he gave them to the people, and I am more than ever convinced of their soundness; yet the league as outlined in the treaty conforms to none of those fundamental conditions. And I am surely justified in testing it by the rigid standards of one of its greatest authors in my effort to analyze its covenants and forecast its consequences.

You very properly "deplore the efforts made by the opposition to belittle and embarrass the President," and so do I. They are unworthy alike of their authors and of the mighty problem confronting them. I have had naught but admiration for the President and sympathy with his ideals and purposes. I have never failed to say so. I have denounced these miserable naggings and reflections upon the President's motives, his abilities, and his judgment more than once upon the floor of the Senate and elsewhere. I know the difficulties besetting him in Paris and the beasts with which he fought there, as did Paul at Ephesus. I know he performed his great task as well as any man similarly circumstanced could have done. It is with sorrow that I find myself compelled to differ from him upon a great question of international concern lying so near to his heart. But on occasions like these my first duty is to my country and myself as I am given to perceive and understand that duty. Therefore, after months of vigil and anxious thought, after viewing this treaty from every standpoint, historical, political, economical, and practical, I can not under my oath of office cast my vote for the ratification of this treaty in its present form.

Let me add in conclusion that ample provision is made by the treaty for ending war in advance of its final ratification. In a speech in the Senate on August 28 last Senator KNOX thus disposed of the subject: "In the last article, the fourth and third clauses preceding the testimonial clause read as follows:

> A first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratification will be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by Germany, on the one hand, and by three of the principal allied and associated powers on the other hand. From the date of this first procès-verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present treaty this date will be the date of the coming into force of this treaty.
> Germany and Great Britain have already ratified the treaty. So soon therefore as the treaty has been ratified by any two of the remaining allied and associated powers, the remaining powers being the United States, France, Italy, and Japan, and when the procè verbal of such deposit of ratifications has been drawn up "the state of war will terminate," as a reading of the many treaty clauses coming into force at that time and making the further conduct of the war impossible will clearly show.

The events here outlined would not establish the league, but they would end the state of war now theoretically existing.

It pains me deeply to differ from friends like yourselves upon a subject of such vital concern to our country and to the world. But it is for that supreme reason that I have studied the problem from the records of the past, the conditions of the present, and the welfare of the future. These guides point to the only path I can follow, and whatever the results, I shall have the consolation of my judgment and my conscience.

Very sincerely, yours,

C. S. THOMAS.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I present a resolution adopted by Miami Miners' Union No. 70, of Arizona, favoring the ratification of the covenant of the league of nations. It is very short, and I ask without a violation of the rule that I have laid down for myself that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the covenant of the league of nations recognizes labor as a sensate force of human attributes; has the right to be considered when its voice is raised in conclaves of men deliberating on the affairs of humanity; and whose destiny is also involved in whatever fortunes is meted to the peoples of the world; and

Whereas the recognition of these several attributes, human and social, by the covenant, stabilizes the economic relations between the various nations of the world and therefor promotes peace endeavors: Be it

Resolved, That Miami Miners' Union No. 70, International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, as an integral part of the forces of labor, align itself with the spirit of the covenant that raises labor from a mechanical device to a living and vocative expression of men whose collective genius is the foundation upon which the structure of civilization rests; and further

Resolved, That the Union through these resolutions invoke the Congress of the United States to ratify the covenant of the league of nations and thus be a party to the upholding of a new thought, a new order for good, that arose out of the ashes of a devastating war.

Adopted by Miami Miners' Union in regular meeting September 10, 1919.

KENNETH CLAYTON, Secretary.

ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES H. RUTHERFORD.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a copy of an address delivered by Hon. Charles H. Rutherford, vice president for Arizona of the American Bar Association, who ably discusses the proposed league of nations.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

[Address delivered by Hon. Charles H. Rutherford, vice president of the American Bar Association for Arizona, before the Verde District Bar Association, at Clarkdale, Ariz., July 18, 1919.]

"Mr. President and gentlemen of the Verde District Bar Association, while I feel greatly honored by being privileged to address you on the momentous question of the league of nations—a question that I conceive to be the greatest that has been before the American people since the drafting of the Declaration of Independence, I feel also that it is a question so many-sided that it would be impossible in the time at my disposal to cover more than a single phase of the subject. I will therefore attempt to consider it only from the purely legal side, as providing for the first time in the history of civilization a real court of last resort for the settlement of international differences.

"We have a great corpus of what we call international law. We all burned in our day more or less midnight oil in striving to master its intricacies, and as soon as we were admitted to practice we forgot what little we ever knew about it. And why? Because it was—and is—but a pure abstraction.

"This statement may be questioned, but I submit that it is the plain, unvarnished truth. What really constitutes a body of practical working law?

"In the first place, we must have either the statute or the customary law as a foundation—international law has no such basis, except it be the mass of treaties, agreements, balances of power, and other tools of the diplomats, and we have reason to know by the bitter experience of the past four years that these are, after all, but 'scraps of paper' to be obeyed or to be torn up as the whim of any nation may dictate. I maintain that any working law must have a surer foundation than this, else, as a corpus juris, it does not exist.

"We hear and read much of justiciable and nonjusticiable matters and the text writers are able to draw lines of the utmost fineness and delicacy between the two. What, may I ask, becomes of these fine-spun distinctions when one nation throws down the gage of battle and another picks it up? Read the answer in the crimes committed by the Germans in France, in Belgium, in Serbia, and in Russia. How many of the so-called Hague conventions governing the conduct of civilized war did they observe or respect? Not one. For them international law was nonexistent and The Hague conventions but another 'scrap of paper' to be disregarded whenever their interest seemed to indicate such course as tending to possible victory.

"I repeat that for the Germans there was no such thing as law, whether of God or of man.

"In the next place, in order that we may have laws that are effective we must have courts to construe them.

"I need not say to this body of practicing attorneys that even the finest and most perfect statutes that the wit of man could devise would be but so much waste paper unless we had courts to adjudicate and determine the rights of the people under those statutes, to construe them, and, most important of all, to enforce them.

"And in order that the decree of the court may be translated into action the court must have its officers authorized and qualified to execute the decrees, its sheriffs and bailiffs to enforce the writs of judgment, its jails to hold the recalcitrant, aye, and its hangman to execute those condemned to the halter by its due processes.

"Eliminate any of these prerequisites and your system of law and law enforcement falls like a child's house of cards.

"Herein, as I see it, lies the everlasting weakness of international law. In the first place, it is a vague and utterly uncodified system, largely dependent upon text writers, diplomats, and treaty makers, and without any substantial basis on which all peoples are agreed. It is well nigh pure theory and is subject to infinite change with every trifling variation in the affairs of nations. No man can truthfully say that he knows much about it, and, as Germany has shown us, it has no basis in solid fact.

"In the next place, there is not now nor ever has been any court to determine the rights of litigants or to adjudicate disputed questions. We have had treaties by the thousand, some open and some signed in secret and preserved with every care from the knowledge of the world. We have had triple alliances, quadruple alliances, balances of power, balances of armies and navies, Hague conventions, peace palaces, peace commissioners, peace promises, disarmament agreements, arbitration treaties, and all other makeshifts and expedients that diplomats could invent, and what have they or any one of them amounted to when submitted to the acid test of practice? The answer is simple—less than nothing.

"I defy any man to cite to me a single treaty that was not just exactly what the Germans declared it to be, 'a scrap of paper' that might be disregarded at any time that it became to the interest of either party to so treat it.

"The treaty between nations is no whit different from the contract between individuals—it is absolutely worthless without a court to construe it and with power to enforce its findings.

"You may say that the treaty becomes binding by virtue of the mutual pledges of good faith and by the solemn covenants that it contains, and you may add that the nation that breaks a treaty incurs thereby everlasting shame and disgrace. I submit that no such fate has befallen any one of the nations that has broken treaties ever since the first one was drawn. In the late war Italy was bound to the German-Austrian alliance by treaties as solemn as could be made. Is she eternally disgraced because she failed to live up to her contract? Germany was pledged to respect the integrity of Belgium. Did she do so?

"I maintain that before we can have treaties that are not 'scraps of paper' we must have a tribunal of some sort that has the right to adjudicate between nations, and when we have that tribunal we shall need no more treaties.

"This tribunal can be erected only by the common agreement of the nations, and this agreement, this necessary contact of minds, we have for the first time in the history of mankind in the league of nations.

"My third point was that a court was not a court in the true sense of the term unless it has the power to enforce its decrees to the uttermost. Our civil and criminal courts all have such power, and therefore they are working, practical, potent institutions. Take away that power of enforcement and you have, ipso facto, done away with your court.

"Where do you find such a court in the realm of international law? Nowhere until now, but you do find it in the league of nations, which is equipped with all the machinery necessary to make its decrees effective.

"This league or tribunal has every necessary function and appurtenance of a working court. It has a body of codified law under which it acts; it is constituted for the express purpose of construing that law, and it has the 'teeth' to render its constructions effective.

"I maintain that this breaks new ground in international history and in international law, and to the great man whose fertile brain conceived the splendid idea I render my homage, careless of what political party he espouses or of what his other qualifications may be. It is not necessary that I should be of his particular opinion on matters of American politics, to his surpassing political genius I render my respect and my admiration, and, gentlemen, I feel that I am well within the truth when I say that President Woodrow Wilson will be remembered with affection and gratitude as long as the history of the race is written by reason of this magnificent achievement in political and diplomatic affairs by which, for the first time since the dawn of history, there seems a possibility of the final and complete elimination of the greatest curse of humanity—war.

"There are not wanting those who would take from President Wilson much of the credit for this stupendous idea, this magnificent conception. It is doubtless true that the adumbration of the idea has possessed the minds and hearts of men ever since the dawn of civilization, but it remained for him and his genius to crystallize the theory into practice and to present a working and workable plan for the solution of world difficulties and international disputes.

"Let us not hesitate, whether we be Republicans, Democrats, or what not, to give credit where credit is due, and I might submit that when all is said and done it is to Woodrow Wilson and to no one else that we must credit the conception of the league of nations as a workable, practical entity.

"And I am convinced that the common consent of all the peoples of the world is with him and is backing up the idea. In it they can see at least a hope of relief from their heaviest burdens, for let us not forget that we alone of the nations of the world have been free from the horrid necessity of maintaining great armies and navies. Every nation of Europe has been held back for centuries by the financial and physical burden of military and naval preparedness. We have often read of Europe as 'an armed camp,' and we know that the phrase was but a literal statement of the truth. Had a tithe of the cost of armaments been devoted to education or to the alleviation of social conditions Europe would be to-day a paradise instead of a hell.

"It may well be that the covenant of the league is not precisely as he first conceived it—it would be simply miraculous if it should be, as miraculous as was alleged to be the Septuagint translation of the Bible, in which, according to tradition, 70 individual men made a translation of the original text and each one of those translations was the same as the others, word for word and letter for letter.

"The covenant of the league was, after all, but a human document and therefore subject to human error. So was our Constitution, admittedly one of the greatest efforts of the human brain. But we have found it necessary to amend the Constitution—not once or twice, but repeatedly—and we shall, in the years to come, find it necessary to make still further changes for 'tempora mutantur et nos mutamur in illos.'

"So, I apprehend, shall we find it neccessary to amend and change the covenant of the league of nations to keep it abreast of the advances of civilization and in harmony with the times and with the varying needs of its signers. But this does not detract from the majesty of the original conception nor from the genius of its original framer. Let the carpers and critics jeer and jibe as they will, the fact remains that to Woodrow Wilson every fair-minded man must give the credit for enunciating in concrete form the yearnings and desires of centuries for a world to which war shall be a stranger and over which the white dove of peace shall spread her snowy wings.

"I am willing to go a step further and to admit, for the sake of argument, that the league may prove a complete and utter failure. I still maintain that, if such shall prove the lamentable fact, every credit is due its framer as having suggested the first remedy, the first real remedy, that has ever been suggested. I do not for a moment believe that the league is destined to fail—and this for the great reason that the world wants it. The peoples of the five continents and of the islands of the seven seas cry for peace, assured peace, and for relief from the constant soul-shrivelling fear of war. And what the whole world wants with single-hearted zeal, that it is sure to receive. I believe as surely as I believe that the sun will rise to-morrow morning that the covenant of the league will be accepted by the great common sense of the world, and that it can and will be made effective, because it is so designed that its decrees will not be 'scraps of paper' but decrees that can and will be enforced.

"We have seen the sorry spectacle of certain people attempting to make of this great achievement a partisan matter. We have heard the league ridiculed, cursed, and declared but the product of a visionary, impracticable and bound to become the very mother of new wards. I can but sympathize with those who elevate party above country and that will oppose so monumental a project simply because the man who conceived it happens to be of the opposite political stripe.

"I am proud to be able to say that this is not invariably the case, but that, on the contrary, no small section of the Republican Senators and leaders are in most hearty sympathy with the idea, and, what is more to the point at this moment, will support it with their votes. I maintain that this is no more a party question than was the winning of the war, and I brand as traitor to the best interests of his country the alleged statesman who will oppose it solely and simply on party grounds.

"I venture the assertion with every boldness that 80 per cent of the men and women voters of America are in favor of the plan, and I believe that if it were or could be submitted to a vote of the entire electorate of the United States the vote against it would be so insignificant as to be not worth mentioning. I will go a step further and say that if a plebiscite of the entire world could be taken there would not be a handful of votes cast against it—and these would be cast in Germany and Russia.

"And here in Arizona we have another matter on which we may congratulate ourselves—the fact that our Senators and Congressmen are supporting the league with every power at their command. I do not think there is one of us who does not know what the answer will be when the Secretary of the Senate calls the names of HENRY ASHURST and MARK SMITH, or what the responses would be were the question put in the House of Representatives when the Clerk came to the name CARL HAYDEN.

"These three statesmen have been true to the interests of America throughout the war, and their votes have been cast ever on the side of right. They voted as they did, not because they were Democrats, but because they are patriots; and as they voted throughout the dark and bitter days of the war so they will vote for the acceptance of the plan that we hope will, in God's good providence, put an end to war.

"The opponents of the league tell us that we shall sacrifice our national independence, that the league means internationalism, and that it is but a first step to world socialism. Were I addressing an audience of men untrained and unskilled in the law, I might consider such arguments worth refuting—to an audience like this such action is not necessary. I defy any man to put his finger on one single clause in the covenant that any court of law would construe as an abandonment of one American right.

"Rather than a loss of rights, the covenant means an increase of rights. It means a close partnership of the civilized nations of the world, each retaining its individual sovereignty unimpaired and intact, but all united in what even the league's bitterest opponents must confess is an attempt to solve the world's greatest problem.

"The fantastic visionary, the dreamer, may see a world confederation as an outcome of the league. The man of clearer and saner vision can see in it but a court armed with the powers that are essential to any court—that is, to function adequately and properly. It is often said that courts can punish but not reward, and this is true of the league of nations. Its sole function is to preserve world peace and world order. To that end it is clothed with the necessary powers, just as is any other court, and, I may say in passing, that even the power of guardianship over weak and unadvanced peoples is included. It stands on all fours, with every law court of which we have knowledge, in its organization, its equipment, its power to make decisions, and its power to enforce them when made.

"Before the tribunal of the league, the nations, great and small, must come with their disputes, their differences, their interfering ambitions, and the great supreme council of the one and only international court will do as courts of justice have always done.

"Poise the cause in justice's equal scales, Whose beam stands sure, whose rightful cause prevails."

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, on the 7th of August last the Senate adopted a resolution as follows:

Whereas doubts have been expressed as to the authority of the treaty-making power under the Constitution to enter into the treaty with France, submitted to the Senate for ratification on the 29th day of July, 1919: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, requested to inquire and advise the Senate as to whether there are any constitutional obstacles to the making of the said treaty.

I have the honor by direction of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary to submit its report.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 215, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE.

September 22, 1919—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana, from the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, which was directed by a Senate resolution of August 7, 1919, to advise the Senate as to whether there are any constitutional obstacles to the making of the treaty between the United States and France, signed at Versailles, June 28, 1919, have considered the question and beg to report as follows:

The text of the resolution is as follows:

"Whereas doubts have been expressed as to the authority of the treaty-making power under the Constitution to enter into the treaty with France, submitted to the Senate for ratification the 29th day of July, 1919: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, requested to inquire and advise the Senate as to whether there are any constitutional obstacles to the making of said treaty."

The treaty referred to in the resolution is as follows:

"AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE, SIGNED AT VERSAILLES JUNE 28, 1919.

"Whereas the United States of America and the French Republic are equally animated by the desire to maintain the peace of the world so happily restored by the treaty of peace signed at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, putting an end to the war begun by the aggression of the German Empire and ended by the defeat of that power; and

"Whereas the United States of America and the French Republic are fully persuaded that an unprovoked movement of aggression by Germany against France would not only violate both the letter and the spirit of the treaty of Versailles to which the United States of America and the French Republic are parties, thus exposing France anew to the intolerable burdens of an unprovoked war, but that such aggression on the part of Germany would be and is so regarded by the treaty of Versailles as a hostile act against all the powers signatory to that treaty and as calculated to disturb the peace of the world by involving inevitably and directly the States of Europe and indirectly, as experience has amply and unfortunately demonstrated, the world at large; and

"Whereas the United States of America and the French Republic fear that the stipulations relating to the left bank of the Rhine contained in said treaty of Versailles may not at first provide adequate security and protection to France, on the one hand, and the United States of America as one of the signatories of the treaty of Versailles, on the other;

"Therefore the United States of America and the French Republic having decided to conclude a treaty to effect these necessary purposes, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, and Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States, specially authorized thereto by the President of the United States, and Georges Clemenceau, president of the council, minister of war, and Stéphen Pichon, minister of foreign affairs, specially authorized thereto by Raymond Poincaré, President of the French Republic, have agreed upon the following articles:

"Article I.

"In case the following stipulations relating to the left bank of the Rhine contained in the treaty of peace with Germany signed at Versailles the 28th day of June, 1919, by the United States of America, the French Republic, and the British Empire among other powers:

"'ART. 42. Germany is forbidden to maintain or construct any fortifications either on the left bank of the Rhine or on the right bank to the west of a line drawn 50 kilometers to the east of the Rhine.

"'ART. 43. In the area defined above the maintenance and assembly of armed forces, either permanently or temporarily, and military maneuvres of any kind, as well as the upkeep of all permanent works for mobilization are in the same way forbidden.

"'ART. 44. In case Germany violates in any manner whatever the provisions of articles 42 and 43, she shall be regarded as committing a hostile act against the powers signatory of the present treaty and as calculated to disturb the peace of the world,' may not at first provide adequate security and protection to France, the United States of America shall be bound to come immediately to her assistance in the event of any unprovoked movement of aggression against her being made by Germany.

"Article II.

"The present treaty, in similar terms with the treaty of even date for the same purpose concluded between Great Britain and the French Republic, a copy of which treaty is annexed hereto, will only come into force when the latter is ratified.

"Article III.

"The present treaty must be submitted to the council of the league of nations, and must be recognized by the council, acting, if need be, by a majority, as an engagement which is consistent with the covenant of the league. It will continue in force until on the application of one of the parties to it the council, acting, if need be, by a majority, agrees that the league itself affords sufficient protection.

"Article IV.

"The present treaty will be submitted to the Senate of the United States at the same time as the treaty at Versailles is submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification. It will be submitted before ratification to the French Chambers of Deputies for approval. The ratifications thereof will be exchanged on the deposit of ratifications of the treaty of Versailles at Paris or as soon thereafter as shall be possible.

"In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries, to wit: On the part of the United States of America, Woodrow Wilson, President, and Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, of the United States; and on the part of the French Republic, Georges Clemenceau, president of the council of ministers, minister of war, and Stéphen Pichon, minister of foreign affairs, have signed the above articles both in the English and French languages, and they have hereunto affixed their seals.

"Done in duplicate at the city of Versailles, on the 28th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1919, and the one hundred and forty-third of the Independence of the United States of America.

"[SEAL.] WOODROW WILSON.
"[SEAL.] ROBERT LANSING.
"[SEAL.] G. CLEMENCEAU.
"[SEAL.] S. PICHON."

The treaty-making power is withheld from the States and is conferred upon the President and the Senate in the following paragraph of the Constitution:

"He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." * * * (Art. II, sec. 2, cl. 2.)

The Constitution fortifies this power in the following terms:

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority * * *. (Art. III, sec. 2, cl. 1.)

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." (Art. VI, cl. 2.)

There is in the Constitution no express limitation or qualification upon this power. The evident purpose was to vest in the President and the Senate that full treaty-making power which by international law and usage belongs to every sovereign and independent nation. The only restrictions are such as relate to the integrity and rights of the States and to the structure, operation, and integrity of the Federal Government.

The treaty-making power can not do what the Government in its entirity is prohibited from doing. Justice Field, in the case of Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S., 267), has clearly and fully outlined the scope of the treaty-making power in the following terms:

"The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and of that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent. (Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. v. Lowe, 114 U. S., 525, 541.) But with these exceptions, it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country." (Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall., 199; Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat., 259; Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S., 483; 8 Opinions Attys. Gen., 417; The People v. Gerke, 5 California, 381.)

There are a number of older cases to the same effect which we deem it unnecessary to cite. The late case of O'Reilly de Camara v. Brooke (209 U. S., 45) is an illustration of the ratification of a tort treaty.

Willoughby on the Constitution (vol. 1, sec. 190) states the powers of the Federal Government in the following terms:

"SEC. 190. The Federal power all-comprehensive: The control of international relations vested in the General Government is not only exclusive, but all-comprehensive. That is to say, the authority of the United States in its dealings with foreign powers includes not only those powers which the Constitution specifically grants it, but all those powers which sovereign states in general possess with regard to matters of international concern."

And Hall (English) in his work on international law, in the first paragraph of Chapter X, describes the power in the following terms:

"It follows from the position of a state as a moral being, at liberty to be guided by the dictates of its own will, that it has the power of contracting with another state to do any acts which are not forbidden, or to refrain from any acts which are not enjoined by the law which governs its international relations, and this power being recognized by international law, contracts made in virtue of it, when duly concluded, become legally obligatory."

From various sources of information it appears that such doubt as exists concerning the authority of the treaty-making power constitutionally to enter into the treaty in question arises by reason of the provision of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, which provides that the "Congress shall have power to declare * * * war."

But the subject of making war is not without the field which the treaty-making power may occupy, because Congress is empowered to legislate with reference to it. Congress is by the same article authorized to legislate with reference to a great number of subjects, interstate and foreign commerce, for instance, in respect to which innumerable treaties have been entered into, as is shown in addresses made by two members of your committee, copies of so much of which address as are pertinent to the present inquiry are appended to this report. They were made in vindication of the constitutionality of the covenant for the league of nations, and particularly article 10 thereof, but seems to the committee equally applicable to the question concerning which its views have been solicited.

Is the treaty in question of a character that the President and the Senate are authorized to make? To answer this question, without any purpose to justify the wisdom of the treaty, a brief statement of facts is necessary. It is evident that Germany in the recent war aimed at the crippling and destruction of France—our ally in the Revolutionary War. Our country entered into the war on the primary and technical ground that Germany had invaded, attacked, and in part destroyed our commerce on the high seas, and had sought to sever our commercial intercourse with both France and England, as well as with other portions of Europe. The menace came from Germany, and it was a continuing menace. To remove that menace, both for the present and the future, it became necessary for our country to cooperate with France, as well as with England, in the great struggle. Without their aid we could not by ourselves have vanquished Germany. It was, moreover, evident that if France and England were destroyed or seriously crippled, Germany would have a free hand against our country and our commerce, and we would be to a greater or less extent at her mercy.

While Germany has been vanquished, she is still, by reason of her great resources, her large population, and her military and imperialistic spirit, liable to be a menace in the future, for nothing but force is likely to restrain her from seeking world dominion at the earliest opportunity. Compared with France, her losses in the war were moderate. France, with a population of a little more than half of Germany, lost in killed over 1,200,000 of her population and in crippled and wounded more than twice that number. One-fifth of her territory, and that the most valuable part, was devastated and reduced to a wilderness by the German armies. And she incurred a debt so large as to strain her credit to the utmost and to make it a most serious problem to liquidate the same. In resources and in man power Germany is nearly double that of France, and if left free and untrammeled—in the unrepentant mood she seems to be in—she could, in the near future, easily overrun and cripple, if not destroy, France. It is for the interest of our country that France should be allowed to recuperate and recover her old-time vigor, for she will then be a great shield and protection to us against the German menace in the future, and, besides, she will be a great source of profitable commercial intercourse.

Aside from England, no country under present conditions is more vitally interested in preserving the integrity of France than is our own country. And what we promise to do for France by the proposed treaty England is also ready to undertake.

The material covenant of the treaty is found in the following words:

"The United States of America shall be bound to come immediately to her [France] assistance in the event of any unprovoked movement of aggression against her [France] being made by Germany."

It will be seen that this covenant only aims at protection against Germany, and that it is of a temporary character, to be merged in and substituted by the authority of the league of nations when that is established and put into operation. As the armistice covers the ground between the end of the war and the ratification of the treaty of peace, so the treaty in question aims to cover the ground from the time of the adoption of the treaty until the league of nations, provided for in the treaty, can take its place. In other words, the treaty in question is of a temporary character, to be merged in the final treaty of peace.

Such a treaty is clearly warranted by international law and usage, and is, therefore, within the scope of the treaty-making power of the United States.

Vattel, in his Law of Nations, lays down the doctrine and rule of international law in the following terms:

"But as the weaker party ought, in his necessity, to accept with gratitude the assistance of the more powerful, and not to refuse him such honors and respect as are flattering to the person who receives them, without degrading him by whom they are rendered, so, on the other hand, nothing is more conformable to the law of nature than a generous grant of assistance from the more powerful State, unaccompanied by any demand of a return or, at least, of an equivalent. And in this instance, also, there exists an inseparable connection between interest and duty. Sound policy holds out a caution to a powerful nation not to suffer the lesser States in her neighborhood to be oppressed. If she abandon them to the ambition of a conqueror, he will soon become formidable to herself. Accordingly, sovereigns who are in general sufficiently attentive to their own interests seldom fail to reduce this maxim to practice." (Sec. 179, ch. 12, book 2.)

Wheaton, in his Elements of International Law, states:

"The convention of guaranty (or guarantee) is one of the most usual international contracts. It is an engagement by which one State promises to aid another where it is interrupted, or threatened to be disturbed, in the peaceable enjoyment of its rights by a third power. * * * The guaranty may also be contained in a distinct and separate convention or included among the stipulations annexed to the principal treaty intended to be guaranteed." (Pp. 378, 379 (1916).)

We deem it unnecessary to cite further authority on this point.

Without intending to indorse all that is said in the addresses hereto appended, the committee adopts the general argument thereof as in entire accord with its views.

It is advanced that though an ordinary treaty of alliance is not beyond the power of our Government, this particular treaty offends against the Constitution because, by article 3, there is an unlawful delegation of the power conferred by the Constitution, or that by it there is introduced an agency in the treaty-making power not recognized by the Constitution.

That article reads as follows:

"The present treaty must be submitted to the council of the league of nations and must be recognized by the council, acting, if need be, by a majority, as an engagement which is consistent with the covenant of the league. It will continue in force until on the application of one of the parties to it the council, acting, if need be, by a majority, agrees that the league itself affords sufficient protection."

But in the view of the committee that article merely expresses a condition upon which the treaty becomes effective in the first place and another condition upon the occurrence of which the treaty is terminated. It is scarcely open to controversy at this day that a statute is not invalid because of a condition that it is to go into effect upon a certain contingency, as, for instance, on its approval by the electorate of a State. Similarly, it may pass out of existence upon the happening of some other event in the statute prescribed. The principle involved had the express approval of the Supreme Court in Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649) and more recent cases. There seems to be no reason to doubt that the principle is equally applicable to treaties.

No attempt is made in the treaty, it will be noted, to invest the council with power to add to or subtract from its provisions or to modify them in any way.

The treaty under consideration is clearly warranted by international law, and as such is within the scope of the treaty-making power; and there is nothing in the Constitution which can be construed to prohibit it.

EXCERPTS FROM THE SPEECH OF SENATOR THOMAS J. WALSH OF MONTANA IN THE SENATE ON JUNE 11, 1919.

THE COVENANT AND THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in the general assault upon the plan devised by the statesmen assembled at the peace conference at Versailles for a league of nations to insure the future peace of the world it is insisted that the covenant submitted is in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, and ought for that reason to be rejected by the Senate.

* * * * * * *

This view has not only been advanced in speeches on the floor but there was introduced into the RECORD a contribution to the press by an eminent jurist of the District of Columbia, and wide circulation has been given to addresses of a former ambassador, a professor of law, in which it is elaborately supported.

More recently an address by a Federal judge, asserting that the covenant contravenes the Constitution, was made a part of the RECORD, and on yesterday a resolution was presented by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania, formerly Attorney General of the United States and later Secretary of State, in which the league is denounced and the demand is made that the covenant be separated from the other provisions of the treaty, one paragraph of the resolution, evidently aimed at the covenant, being as follows:

"That since the people of the United States have themselves determined and provided in their Constitution the only ways in which the Constitution may be amended, and since amendment by treaty stipulation is not one of the methods which the people have so prescribed, the treaty-making power of the United States has no authority to make a treaty which in effect amends the Constitution of the United States, and the Senate of the United States can not advise and consent to any treaty provision which would have such effect if enforced."

The basis of the recital from this high authority that the treaty of which the covenant forms a part is inconsistent with the Constitution will be referred to later.

Journals of wide circulation and more or less influence, antagonistic to the league, have assumed, without any attempt at demonstration, that the contention so made is confessedly sound, and that, as one such at least has expressed it, radical amendments of our organic law will be necessary before the United States can enter into the league. The eminent Senator from Massachusetts in the debate with President Lowell, of Harvard, which attracted wide notice, pursued this easy method of disputation, and having assumed the antagonism to be indisputable, added: "No doubt we could amend our Constitution to fit the league, but it would take some time."

The comment just made is offered lest, in view of the history of our country, to which reference will be made, this effort to refute the contention thus advanced might be deemed a work of pedantic supererogation.

BASIS OF CLAIM.

In the main it is founded upon the claim that by the treaty, of which the league is a constituent feature, in the making of which the House of Representatives has no part, our country becomes obligated in a way in which it can be bound, or becomes committed to a course or policy upon which it can enter only through the action of Congress—that is to say, the concurrent action of both Houses of the national legislature. It is particularly urged that the covenant obligates us to wage war in certain contingencies, while the Constitution (Art. I, sec. 8) declares that "Congress shall have power to declare war." The proposition is extravagantly expressed by some as an attempt to transfer the power to declare war from Congress to the league.

In an address delivered in the Senate on December 18 last by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania the question was raised by the following inquiry and comment:

"Suppose that it were proposed that the United States should bind itself in advance by treaty to go to war in given circumstances. Under the Constitution war can be declared only by the Congress. How could the President, by negotiating a treaty, and the Senate, by consenting to its ratification, bind this country to declare war? A declaration of war is, under the Constitution, a prerogative of the Congress. The appropriations to initiate or to conduct war are in the discretion of the Congress."

It will be noted that the Senator, whose acknowledged ability as well as his experience as Attorney General and Secretary of State give to his utterances on the subject he was discussing unusual weight, did not unequivocally commit himself to the view that the treaty-making power is not sufficiently broad to warrant a convention obligating the Nation to make war, either presently or upon a future contingency, yet the casual reader, and especially one disinclined, for any reason, to give the league his support, would unquestionably receive the impression from the language quoted that the Senator subscribed to and had announced that doctrine.

SUCH A TREATY NOT UNIQUE.

In this connection an incident in our diplomatic history, presently to be referred to, is illuminating. The covenant does undoubtedly, should the treaty be signed, obligate this country to make war. Article 10, frequently referred to, reads as follows:

"The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve, as against external aggression, the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled."

That plainly means that if the territory of any member is invaded or threatened by the military forces of any other nation within or without the league, all other members thereof will come to its assistance to repel the aggressor and coerce him into keeping the peace. It may be that commercial pressure and isolation contemplated by other provisions of the covenant may be found effective to restrain a threatened or anticipated military movement directed at a member of the league, but all efforts less drastic failing, the obligation can be honorably discharged only by joining our forces with those of the threatened or invaded country and of the other nations obligated with us and making war upon the disturber of the general peace.

Much eloquence has been expended in denunciation of this feature of the league, but it is the soul and spirit of the covenant. Cut it out, and the heart is cut out of the only plan the statesmanship of the world has been able to devise or has ever been able to offer for the preservation of the peace of the world as a substitute for the system which has again exhibited itself to an agonized world as a colossal and yet miserable failure, but to which some Senators still exhibit a fatuous attachment. It is true, beyond doubt, that that article obligates us to make war. But we have not hesitated heretofore to assume a like obligation. We entered into a treaty with the Republic of Panama, the first article of which is as follows:

"ART. 1. The United States guarantees and will maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama."

No one can doubt the significance of that undertaking. We go to war with any country that attempts to reduce the Republic through whose concession we built the Panama Canal. That treaty was entered into in the year 1904, the late Theodore Roosevelt being President of the United States and PHILANDER C. KNOX, now a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, his Attorney General and official legal adviser. Whatever view may now be entertained by the latter, it is quite evident that in 1904, at least, he harbored no serious doubt of the binding character of a treaty under which the United States became obligated to resort to the dread arbitrament of war. It would be doing him, as well as the President of the United States who negotiated the treaty, a gross injustice to imagine that they accepted the grant of the Canal Zone upon the considerations named in the treaty, the first in importance to the feeble young Republic of Panama being the guaranty of its independence, if either of them at the time conceived that there was any doubt of the authority of the President and the Senate in the exercise of the treaty-making power so to bind the Nation. The comment of the Senator above quoted may well arouse apprehensions on the part of the Government and people of Panama which, in view of his relation to the treaty, he will doubtless hasten to still, if his further study of the subject will permit, by the assurance that whatever doubts he may have entertained in the month of December last concerning the binding character of article 1 of the treaty of 1904, they have, on further reflection, been resolved in favor of the view that it is a solemn obligation of the United States entered into in conformity with the Constitution.

It is persuasive that though the treaty referred to was, at the time it was negotiated, the subject of heated controversy, the right of the President and the Senate under the Constitution to obligate the Nation, as recited in article 1, was questioned by no one, so far as the report of the public debates in relation to the treaty discloses, though there were then in the Senate many profound lawyers, life-long students of the Constitution, including Senators Bacon, Hoar, and Spooner.

Among those voting to ratify it were the following, still Members of the Senate: Senators LODGE, MCCUMBER, NELSON, PENROSE, SIMMONS, SMOOT, and WARREN. It was not without precedent in assuming that there was no transgression of the Constitution in the treaty. In the year 1846 a treaty was concluded with the Republic of New Granada, in which, mention having been made of means of transportation across the Isthmus of Panama and certain concessions in relation thereto granted to the United States, our Government subscribed to the undertaking, evidenced by the following clause thereof:

"And in order to secure to themselves the tranquil and constant enjoyment of these advantages, and as an especial compensation for the said advantages and for the favors they have acquired by the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of this treaty, the United States guarantee, positively and efficaciously, to New Granada, by the present stipulation, the perfect neutrality of the before-mentioned Isthmus, with the view that the free transit from the one to the other sea may not be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time while this treaty exists; and, in consequence, the United States also guarantee in the same manner the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has and possesses over the said territory."

At the time of the ratification of that treaty Webster, Benton, Calhoun, and Clayton were Members of the Senate. None of them, so far as history discloses, had any misgivings concerning the power of the President and the Senate thus to agree for the Nation.

Webster had only recently returned after quitting the post of Secretary of State. Shortly thereafter, in the course of a speech delivered in the Senate, he referred to the provision of the treaty above quoted and alluded to it as a binding obligation of the Government, saying:

"This Government, looking upon this stipulation as a benefit obtained, a boon conceded by the Government of New Granada, as an equivalent for this consideration, entered on its part into an engagement to protect and guarantee and defend the neutrality of this whole Isthmus. This will be seen by reference to the thirty-fifth article of the treaty, which will be found in the volume of the laws of the last session. It is there very distinctly stated. There is no question about it. We are under treaty obligations to maintain the neutrality of this Isthmus and the authority of the Government of New Granada over it."

Senators who insistently protest against the league because the covenant under which it is to operate obligates each member to come to the aid of any that may be attacked by another nation—an obligation which contemplates the waging of war—but into which, it is asserted, this Government can not consistently with the Constitution enter, constitute themselves the special champions of the Monroe doctrine, the maintenance of which they aver to be essential to the preservation of the national integrity. With repeated professions of their devotion to America and her institutions, carrying faintly the suggestion that it is of a quality superior to that of those who differ with them concerning the wisdom of entering into the league, they proclaim that the Monroe doctrine must be upheld at all cost. But what is the Monroe doctrine but a voluntary obligation assumed by the United States to "respect and preserve as against external aggression"—external in this case signifying transoceanic—the Republics of South and Central America? It may be more, but it is at least that. If we were to enter into a treaty with Brazil, say these expounders of the Constitution, by which, upon some consideration moving to us, we undertook to "preserve as against external aggression" her "territorial integrity and existing political independence," it would be a void act, but we are even now bound to do so without a treaty under peril of national obliteration.

HISTORY OF THE CONTENTION.

The controversy over the limitations of the treaty-making power of the Government or of the Executive and the Senate, now renewed, is as old, almost, as the Constitution. It was precipitated by the famous Jay treaty, negotiated in 1794, during the administration of President Washington, and was then disposed of in a way that ought to have been regarded as a final interment of the contention that is the subject of this discussion. Like Banquo's ghost, however, it will not down. It has again and again been urged that in all cases in which, by the Constitution, the action of Congress is necessary—that is to say, participation by the House of Representatives is essential in order that the treaty may be carried out and its obligations discharged—the Executive and the Senate are without authority to enter into the treaty, wanting the concurrence of the House, or the subject altogether transcends the treaty-making power of the Government. The contention has been uniformly rejected, but it renews its youthful vigor from time to time and is urged with all the ardor that ordinarily attends a first presentation, and without the slightest reference to or regard for its unfortunate history. * * *

The Jay treaty gave rise to much acrimonious discussion in the country while it was before the Senate; feeling in respect to it, more or less partisan in character, ran high, but it was eventually ratified by a bare two-thirds vote. It provided for the appointment of various commissions to adjust boundary disputes and to report on claims growing out of the War for Independence. In due course, on the exchange of ratifications, bills were introduced in the House of Representatives making appropriations to meet the salaries of the commissioners so appointed and the other expenses attendant on their labors. Thereupon the contention heretofore adverted to was made, that inasmuch as the treaty could not be carried out without action by the House, it remained in the stage of negotiation until the approval of that body was accorded it, that any nation dealing with ours was bound to take notice of the limitation on the treaty-making power thus asserted, so that no breach of national faith could be charged if the House withheld its approval, and that the duty devolved upon that body to enter into an inquiry as to the wisdom of the still imperfect treaty submitted to it. This view secured the adherence of a majority of the House, which adopted a resolution calling upon the President for the correspondence and documents relating or leading to the treaty. President Washington declined to submit the papers, saying in a dignified reply made to the request of the House, "It is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty." Among other reasons advanced by him impelling his mind to that conclusion, he observed:

"Having been a member of the general convention and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment my conduct has exemplified that opinion—that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward became the law of the land. It is thus that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations, and in all the treaties made with them we have declared and they have believed that when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they became obligatory. In this construction of the Constitution every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced, and until the present time not a doubt or suspicion has appeared, to my knowledge, that this construction was not the true one. Nay, they have more than acquiesced; for till now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect."

The debate on the bills was renewed on the receipt of the President's reply, his position being eloquently championed by Fisher Ames, of Massachusetts. A resolution that the legislation ought to be enacted was carried by a close vote, and the bills were duly passed.

The baselessness of the contention appeared so obvious to Chancellor Kent that, referring to the resolution of April 7, 1796, heretofore adverted to, in his commentaries he said:

"It can not be mentioned at this day without equal regret and astonishment that such a resolution passed the House of Representatives."

The discussion of the subject was renewed over the Louisiana Purchase treaty. A like resolution was introduced in the House, which was called upon to make provision for the payment of the purchase price of the vast domain ceded by France—$15,000,000—but it was defeated, the Federalists leading in the contention that it was the right and the duty of the House to inquire into the merits of the treaty, as the Republicans, by which name the party of Jefferson was then known, had led in opposition to the Jay treaty. The historian does not hesitate to assign partisan bias as the moving influence in each instance for the attitude of those who insisted that the treaty was void or inchoate, wanting the approval of the House of Representatives, and the circumstance that the leaders of each of the parties of that day took a position in 1803 the very reverse of that they assumed in 1796 leaves little doubt of the justice of the judgment thus passed upon the official acts.

The chronicler of the events of our fateful day will not fail to note how statesmen who, scarcely more than three years ago, when the hope was reasonably indulged by them that the treaty of peace presently to be submitted to us would be negotiated during a Republican administration, extolled the plan of a league of nations to preserve the peace of the world, then contemplated as an integral part of the treaty, as worthy of all praise, a consummation most devoutly to be wished, now that it comes as the result of the labors of a Democratic President, denounce it as an abomination.

The resolution looking to an inquiry by the House of Representatives into the course of the negotiations resulting in the treaty with France having been disposed of, it quickly recognized the binding force thereof, the obligation which, through it, had been incurred by the Nation, and passed the necessary legislation for the liquidation of the debt.

The controversy was renewed, however, in 1816 over the commercial treaty with Great Britain; in 1834 in connection with a later treaty with France; in 1867 after the treaty with Russia ceding Alaska; in 1887 while the Hawaiian treaty was before the Senate; in 1899 over the treaty with Spain, by which the Philippines were acquired; and, in a mild way, in 1904, when the treaty with Panama was being considered.

SUBJECT NOT EXCLUDED FROM TREATY-MAKING POWER BECAUSE CONGRESS EMPOWERED TO LEGISLATE CONCERNING IT.

A number of the treaties referred to called for large appropriations to pay for territory acquired; others required legislation modifying our tariff and tonnage laws; others, as heretofore pointed out, bound us in defensive alliances, contemplating in each case war against the enemy of the other party to the treaty. In no case has Congress ever declined to pass the necessary legislation to make effective or to carry into execution the treaty.

It is of no consequence that the treaty deals with a subject with reference to which Congress is given power to legislate. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is, by the Constitution, given power to make treaties which, with the Constitution and laws of the United States made in pursuance of it, are the supreme law of the land, as the Constitution declares.

It has been held by the Supreme Court so often that reference to specific cases is unnecessary, that a treaty in conflict with a prior act of Congress repeals it, and e converso that a later act of Congress inconsistent with a treaty renders it nugatory, the later law prevailing. There could, of course, be no conflict if the two did not occupy the same field.

"By the Constitution a treaty is placed on the same footing and made of like obligation with an act of legislation. Both are declared by that instrument to be the supreme law of the land, and no superior efficacy is given to either over the other." (Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U. S., 190.)

The theory that the treaty-making power does not extend to any subject with reference to which power is vested in Congress, if it ever was seriously maintained, was long ago exploded. I can not hope to expose its utter weakness with anything like the eloquence or lucidity with which the task was discharged by Hon. James Barbour, a Senator from Virginia, in the great debate on the commercial treaty with Great Britain in 1816. I submit, however, a few observations in that connection.

The Constitution gives to Congress power to legislate with reference to foreign commerce, but this does not mean that the President may not, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, enter into commercial treaties. The constitutional convention clearly contemplated that such treaties would come within the power it proposed to confer upon the President and the Senate, since it rejected a proposition to require the assent of two-thirds of all the Members of the Senate for the ratification of commercial treaties, though the concurrence of two-thirds of those present would suffice in the case of other treaties. Commercial treaties have been negotiated with nearly every civilized country, dealing with a multiplicity of questions affecting transactions in foreign commerce, in most instances either requiring action by Congress or stipulating against its action or constraining it to action along prescribed lines.

So Congress is given power by the first clause of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution to lay and collect duties, which further provides that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. Yet by the Louisiana Purchase treaty it was stipulated that for 12 years the ships of France or Spain entering any of the ports of the ceded territory shall be required to pay only such tonnage charges and duties upon their cargoes as should be exacted of the ships and citizens of the United States, and that such privileges should be extended to no other nation.

By article 1 of the treaty with Cuba, proclaimed December 17, 1903, it is provided that all products of that country then admitted to the United States free of duty should thereafter, so long as the treaty stood, be so admitted without payment of any duty, and by article 2 of the same treaty the United States bound itself to admit all other products of the young Republic with a differential in its favor of 20 per cent. An examination of the record discloses that among those voting to ratify that treaty was the senior Senator from Massachusetts, who in the debate with President Lowell, told his auditors that the treaty embracing the league covenant, "because the tariff is involved in the article for the boycott," and because it allows other nations to "meddle with our tariff," "runs up against a provision of the Constitution," which "provides that all revenue bills shall originate in the House of Representatives." The covenant contemplates that instead of resorting to war to coerce a recalcitrant nation commercial pressure or commercial isolation may be resolved upon by the league. If it recommends that course, the Nation binds itself to lay an embargo, a procedure expressly held by the Supreme Court more than a hundred years ago to be within the power of Congress to direct. The tariff is only remotely involved, if involved at all. By what provision of the covenant do we permit foreign nations to "meddle" with our tariff? It is difficult to conceive how our tariff could come before the league for consideration. It is a domestic question, expressly excluded from those with which the league deals, distinctively a matter of domestic policy which each nation has heretofore solved without question as to its right under international law to do so, in accordance with its own views of its interest. Our tariff has never yet brought us to the threshold of war with any country. If we do not discriminate against any particular nation—and our commercial treaties forbid us to do so; even if our settled policy did not—how can any complain? We have, as stated, repeatedly made treaties by which we, in consideration of reciprocal advantages they respectively accorded us, bound ourselves that Congress would not exercise its full powers with reference to the tariff, so extensive as to permit our Government to reward its friends and punish its enemies through discriminatory duties. In that sense we have permitted foreign nations in the past to "meddle" with our tariff * * *.

Again, the Constitution invests Congress with the power to "raise and support armies" and to "provide and maintain a navy," but it does not preclude the President and the Senate, in the exercise of the treaty-making power, from entering into a treaty limiting the size or nature of our Military Establishment or the number of ships we shall maintain as a part of our Navy, or the particular waters in which they may be stationed. We have, in fact, entered into a treaty with Great Britain, scrupulously observed for over a century, not to keep on the Great Lakes more than a limited number of armed vessels, fitted only for police and like duties appertaining to the collection of revenue, a reciprocal agreement having been entered into by the British Government on behalf of Canada. Despite repeated assaults upon that convention, it remains a solemn obligation of this Government, as was conclusively demonstrated a few days ago by the eloquent junior Senator from Arizona. There would seem to be no reason why we might not enter into a reciprocal treaty, under which both countries interested would undertake not to maintain military posts along the great international boundary line between this country and Canada, a policy that has been pursued by each since early in the last century without a treaty.

Congress is empowered to make laws in relation to the naturalization of aliens, but in perhaps every treaty through which any addition was made to our territory stipulations are found through which the subjects or citizens of the State making the cession, residing in the newly acquired territory, were admitted to citizenship. Such wholesale citizenship was conferred upon the inhabitants of Florida by the treaty of cession with Spain ratified in 1821. The United States even obligated itself by that treaty to admit Florida into the Union as one of the States.

Congress is authorized to make all needful rules and regulations concerning the territory and other property of the United States. We negotiated a treaty with Japan, Russia, and Great Britain by which the United States, in order to conserve the fur-seal herd, whose breeding grounds are on the Pribilof Islands, from extinction through pelagic sealing carried on by the citizens or subjects of those countries, agreed to kill annually the mature bachelor seals resorting to the islands and to divide the skins in proportions specified in the treaty between the nations named and our own, they and we agreeing to make pelagic sealing criminal. It may be that the seals in the sea are ferae natura, belonging to no one, but we have all the incidents of ownership in them while they are on the breeding grounds, the property of the United States.

Is there any doubt that a treaty could be made with Great Britain by which this country should make an island in Lake Superior a bird refuge, if she should devote an adjacent island on her side to the same purpose, or with Mexico to the effect that if she would establish a refuge for migratory birds wintering in her territory we would set apart certain territory in Alaska for their protection on which they make their summer home?

Note that the provision of the Constitution gives to Congress power not only to make all needful laws respecting the territory, but as well respecting other property of the United States. We have a treaty with Great Britain concerning the use of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal and another concerning the use of the Panama Canal. In all the heated controversy over the subject of the tolls, participated in by the ablest lawyers in America, no one ventured to contend that the treaty is void because dealing with a subject with reference to which Congress is given power to legislate.

The position that a subject is beyond the treaty-making power because within the powers granted to Congress is utterly indefensible and need be no longer noticed.

Heretofore one of the most distinguished expositors of this theory of our Constitution, now so eagerly embraced by the opponents of the league, was a German jurist—Dr. Ernest Meier, a professor in one of the universities of his country, who in a volume of his lectures commented as follows:

"Congress has, under the Constitution, the right to lay taxes and imposts, as well as to regulate foreign trade, but the President and the Senate, if the 'treaty-making power' be regarded as absolute, would be able to evade this limitation by adopting treaties which would compel Congress to destroy its whole tariff system. According to the Constitution, Congress has the right to determine questions of naturalization, of patents, and of copyright. Yet, according to the view here contested, the President and Senate, by a treaty, could on these important questions utterly destroy the legislative capacity of the House of Representatives. The Constitution gives Congress the control of the Army. Participation in this control would be snatched from the House of Representatives by a treaty with a foreign power by which the United States would bind itself to keep in the field an army of a particular size. The Constitution gives Congress the right of declaring war; this right would be illusory if the President and Senate could by a treaty launch the country into a foreign war. The power of borrowing money on the credit of the United States resides in Congress; this power would cease to exist if the President and Senate could by treaty bind the country to the borrowing of foreign funds. By the Constitution 'no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law'; but this limitation would cease to exist if by a treaty the United States could be bound to pay money to a foreign power. * * * Congress would cease to be the lawmaking power as is prescribed by the Constitution; the lawmaking power would be the President and the Senate. Such a condition would become the more dangerous from the fact that treaties so adopted, being on this particular hypothesis superior to legislation, would continue in force until superseded by other treaties. Not only, therefore, would a Congress consisting of two Houses be made to give way to an oligarchy of President and Senate, but the decrees of this oligarchy, when once made, could only be changed by concurrence of President and of senatorial majority of two-thirds."

The war has demonstrated how feebly the German mind has been able to comprehend the American character or the American system. The evils he foresees may, indeed, ensue, but none of them ever have befallen us, and the probability of our experiencing them is too remote to prompt us to revise our Constitution because of the defects and dangers he so generously points out. His apprehensions are quite like those that the opponents of the Constitution sought to arouse when it was before the people for ratification. The dangers inherent in the treaty-making power were a fruitful theme in those days. Indeed, the Constitutional Convention was not without a keen sense of the tremendous nature of the authority it was extending to the Executive and the Senate through the few brief words in which it is conveyed. But it rightly concluded that a compact with a foreign Government which commanded the support of the President and two-thirds of the Senate could scarcely be inimical to the welfare of the Union, so far as enlightened public opinion could discern the national interest, and that it was scarcely conceivable that such concert could be secured for a policy that was violative or destructive to American ideals.

LIMITATIONS ON TREATY-MAKING POWER CONSIDERED.

But it is asserted that though the treaty-making power may be vast, it is not unlimited. Undoubtedly so. It is said to be impossible to frame a power of attorney in terms so general as not to be subject to implied limitations. Whatever the limitations on the treaty-making power, they are implied; none whatever are expressed. "He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators concur," is the simple language of the Constitution. Nothing is excluded in express terms. No particular kind of treaties is specified, so that all kinds are included—treaties of alliance, offensive and defensive, commercial treaties, extradition treaties, arbitration treaties.

In the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States (Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S., 483) the following is quoted with approval from a speech delivered in the House of Representatives by William Pinkney, of Maryland:

"The word 'treaties' is nomen generalissimum and will comprehend commercial treaties, unless there be a limit upon it by which they are executed. It is the appellative, which will take in the whole species, if there be nothing to limit its scope. There is no such limit. There is not a syllable in the context of the clause to restrict the natural import of its phraseology. The power is left to the force of the generic term and is therefore as wide as a treaty-making power can be. It embraces all the varieties of treaties which it could be supposed this Government could find it necessary or proper to make, or it embraces none. It covers the whole treaty-making ground which this Government could be expected to occupy, or not an inch of it.

"It is a just presumption that it was designed to be coextensive, with all the exigencies of our affairs. Usage sanctions that presumption—expediency does the same. The omission of any exception to the power, the omission of the designation of a mode by which a treaty not intended to be included within it might otherwise be made, confirms it."

Reliance is placed upon the language of Justice Field in Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S., 258–267), as follows:

"The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and of that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent."

Which is followed by this sentence:

"But with these exceptions it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country."

With much diffidence, but with the utmost confidence, I venture to assert that the territory of a State may either in whole or in part be ceded under the treaty power without its consent, though the dictum of the learned justice is supported by the authority of other great names. Had Mexico listened to the lure of the Zimmermann-Eckhardt note, joined her fortunes with those of Germany in an effort to regain the "lost provinces," and under the stern compulsion of a dictated peace following a decisive victory of Wilhelm and his allies, a treaty was signed by the President and ratified by the Senate ceding to Mexico Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, can anyone doubt the efficacy of the act to transfer the sovereignty over that imperial domain to our prudent neighbor to the south which wisely ignored the invitation? Would it be asserted, for instance, that thereafter a Federal court could continue to function within the region affected; that United States revenue officers could continue to discharge their duties therein as theretofore; and that their acts would be recognized by our courts as valid because the treaty was without constitutional warrant? Could the Secretary of the Interior be mandamused to issue a patent to lands therein to one otherwise becoming entitled to it? To my mind, it is of no consequence that the President and the Senate may have yielded their assent in order to save from subjection the remainder of the country or to preserve it from desolation. Manifestly an overweening necessity must be assumed to imagine such an exercise of the treaty-making power, but who is to judge of the necessity; who shall say when conditions are sufficiently grave to justify such a treaty? Obviously not the courts, and equally obvious is it that the determination rests with the President and the Senate.

What good reason is there to doubt that an exchange might be effected by treaty of islands lying off our coast, one being within the jurisdiction of one of the States of the Union, but devoted wholly to national uses, the other more suitable to our purposes belonging to the other party to the treaty? Assume the case of two islands in Puget Sound or the Strait of San Juan de Fuca, both uninhabited, the one a part of the State of Washington, and consequently of the United States, and the other within the jurisdiction of British Columbia. She is willing to exchange, and the National Government is desirous of acquiring her island with a view to devoting it to the better protection of that coast against an enemy or some purpose connected with the safer navigation of those waters. Can the State of Washington veto the transfer? It is unreasonable that she should; but is the rest of the country at the mercy of her whim? If the island were densely populated and the inhabitants adverse to going under foreign dominion, in all reasonable probability the President and the Senate would yield unhesitatingly to their desires. But that aspect of the case presents the question of the wisdom or justice of making and not to the power to make the treaty.

Without attempting to specify, I may say that considerations similar to those here advanced have led statesmen and jurists of no less eminence than those announcing a contrary view to the conclusion that under the treaty-making power even the territory of one of the States of the Union may be transferred to a foreign power.

In the adjustment of the northeast boundary dispute the formal assent of Maine and Massachusetts was secured, not because of the surrender of territory over which they asserted jurisdiction, for Massachusetts could claim none, but because they owned in common lands within the region which under the Webster-Ashburton treaty went to New Brunswick, as will appear from the speech of Mr. Webster in justification of the compromise made on his reentry into the Senate.

This particular inquiry is in the nature of a digression from the general subject. It has been followed to perhaps unpardonable length only to make more clear the very comprehensive character of the treaty-making power conferred by the Constitution.

But, whatever the limitations on the treaty-making power may be, they obviously do not embrace undertakings such as article 10 of the covenant, in effect, as pointed out, a treaty of alliance under which the United States is obligated to go to the aid of any member of the league attacked by another nation contrary to the covenant. Alliances were, and for centuries had been, common among the nations of the earth at the time the Constitution was adopted. The right to enter into such inheres in a sovereign independent State. The Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled having proclaimed, in the Declaration of Independence, that the Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, continued, that as such "they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances," and "do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do."

An alliance in international law is—

"A union or association of two or more States or nations, formed by league or treaty, for the joint prosecution of a war or for their mutual protection in repelling hostile attacks." (Black's Law Dictionary.)

Bouvier has the following definition of the term and comment thereon:

"In international law: A contract, treaty, or league between two or more sovereigns or States made for purposes of aggression or defense.

"Defensive alliances are those in which a nation agrees to defend her ally in case the latter is attacked. Offensive alliances are those in which nations unite for the purpose of making an attack or jointly waging war against another nation."

A modern writer on international law says:

"Alliances in the strict sense of the term are treaties of union between two or more States for the purpose of defending each other against an attack in war or jointly attacking third States or for both purposes."—Oppenheim.

It is inconceivable that the founders of our Government should, at its birth, specifically assert the right of the United States as an independent Nation to contract alliances and that they then contrived a Constitution which disabled the Nation from so contracting. As is well known, having declared their right so to do, they proceeded without delay to enter into a treaty of alliance with France. Some provisions of this treaty are interesting in this connection. Article 1 is as follows:

"If war should break out between France and Great Britain during the continuance of the present war between the United States and England, His Majesty and the said United States shall make it a common cause and aid each other mutually with their good offices, their counsels, and their forces, according to the exigence of conjunctures, as becomes good and faithful allies."

Article 8 as follows:

"Neither of the two parties shall conclude either truce or peace with Great Britain without the formal consent of the other first obtained; and they mutually engage not to lay down their arms until the independence of the United States shall have been formally or tacitly assured by the treaty or treaties that shall terminate the war."

Article 11, in part, as follows:

"The two parties guarantee mutually from the present time and forever against all powers, to wit: The United States to His Most Christian Majesty, the present possessions of the Crown of France in America, as well as those which it may acquire by the future treaty of peace. And His Most Christian Majesty guarantees on his part to the United States their liberty, sovereignty, and independence." (I Treaties and Conventions, pp. 480–481.)

This treaty was in full force and vigor at the time the Constitution was drafted and adopted. It gave rise to universal rejoicing at the time it was effected and retained, when the convention was engaged in its labors and throughout the stormy period that preceded the adoption of the Constitution, a high place in popular favor. The excesses of the French Revolution which followed speedily were largely responsible for the determination later arrived at and concurred in by nearly all our leading statesmen, to disregard some of its obligations, speedily condoned by France, which in a spirit of continued amity and with a quickened sense of a common interest ceded Louisiana to our country under Napoleon. There is no doubt that it was the distressing experience we had had with this treaty with France that led Washington to warn his countrymen in his Farewell Address against "entangling alliances." It will be remembered that in the same connection he descanted upon the unwisdom of entertaining either excessive love or excessive hatred toward any nation, having in mind the prevailing intensity of feeling with regard to France on the one hand and Great Britain on the other growing out of the War for Independence.

It is unnecessary to say that if in the opinion of Washington, and Hamilton, it might be added, for the latter undoubtedly collaborated in the preparation of the address, the treaty-making power did not, under the Constitution, extend to alliances, offensive or defensive, or both, there would have been no occasion to give the warning of which so much has been heard in this debate. The revered statesman, who was president of the convention which framed the Constitution, would have contented himself with an admonition to observe scrupulously the fundamental law, and a reminder to his readers that it forbade treaties of alliance.

* * * * * * *

Article 10 is unassailable on constitutional grounds. In its substantive part it is to all intents and purposes a treaty of alliance. It concludes, "In case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled." The purpose of this clause is obviously to secure concert of action, but it is left to each nation to determine for itself, the recommendation of the council notwithstanding, whether the occasion calls for action in fulfillment of its obligation and how that obligation ought to be discharged.

Under article 16 each member undertakes that it will, should any other resort to war in disregard of articles 12, 13, or 14, immediately interdict all trade or financial relations with the nationals of the covenant-breaking State—that is, institute a complete embargo against the offending State. In such a case it becomes the duty of the council to "recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military and naval forces the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armaments or forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league," the obligation to make war in such case arising, if at all, by virtue of the covenant of article 10. Again, the only power the council has in the premises is to recommend what contribution each nation should make, that a recalcitrant may be reduced should a resort to arms be necessary.

NO DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY TO DECLARE WAR.

A careful study of the covenant will reveal that neither the council nor the assembly has any power to declare war or even to call upon the members to make war, unless the authority to issue such a call and the obligation to respond is implied in the first section of article 11, as follows:

"Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations."

At most the language quoted can not be construed to grant any more extensive authority than is reposed in the council under article 10 should a war of aggression be prosecuted by any member of the league, namely, to advise upon the means by which it is to be suppressed. Even if authority were reposed in either assemblage of league representatives to determine whether the obligation of article 10 had become active, and that it must be discharged by war against the offending State, there could be no valid objection to the covenant on constitutional grounds, for the various clauses through which such power would be granted would amount only to a covenant to make war whenever the league should determine as a fact that through external aggression the territorial integrity or political independence of a member was threatened. In any case there is no delegation of authority to the league to declare war or to make any order or proclamation as a result of which a state of war with all its consequences, like the suspension of all commercial intercourse, with which we have become familiar, immediately follows. A declaration of war by Congress is indispensable to put this country in a state of war unless actually attacked. The league covenant is a treaty by which our country binds itself at most to take the necessary steps to engage in war when the league determines that the occasion has arisen when, under the treaty, it should do so. This was recognized by the junior Senator from Washington in that part of one of his forceful addresses in which he assailed the league as being violative of the Constitution. But, he asserted, the action of Congress in such case would be perfunctory, there would be no escape from the obligation of the treaty "but in repudiation and dishonor." He is quite right. When by the treaty with France our country agreed to pay $15,000,000 for Louisiana, Congress was called upon perfunctorily to make the necessary appropriation. It could not in honor canvass the wisdom or the unwisdom of the purchase. The treaty obligated us to enact the necessary legislation. There was no escape from that obligation but in repudiation and dishonor. Similarly when by treaty we acquired Florida, Congress was called upon perfunctorily to make the necessary appropriation. And so with each successive acquisition of territory by treaty involving the payment of money—the purchase of Alaska and the Philippines, by way of illustration.

The Senator is right that there would be no escape from the obligation of the treaty but in repudiation and dishonor. But if he is correct in the view for which he contends, that the whole plan is violative of the Constitution, or is so violative in the particular feature involved in any transaction, there would be neither repudiation nor dishonor in declining to observe its terms. There is neither dishonor nor discredit in a man's declining to pay a promissory note executed in his name by one who never was authorized by him to make such an instrument.

FURTHER GROUNDS OF ATTACK CONSIDERED.

It would be gathered from much that has been said upon this subject that the league was to assume control of the whole subject (of armaments), increasing or authorizing an increase in the case of any nation at will, reducing or prescribing a reduction at its pleasure. Before attempting to consider how grievously the Constitution is disregarded in this particular it will be well to have in mind what authority is conferred.

The league is authorized to propose a plan for the reduction of armaments, which becomes operative when approved by the nations affected. They all agree, assuming all approve the plan, to reduce accordingly.

This is the voluntary act of each government. Then each agrees not to increase so as to exceed the limit agreed upon without the permission of the league; that is, beyond a further limit to be fixed by the council. The only reason urged against the constitutionality of these provisions is that as Congress is given power to "raise and support armies" and "to provide and maintain a navy," the stipulation is an invasion of the exclusive power of Congress. But if it has not been demonstrated beyond cavil or controversy that it is no valid objection to a treaty that it deals with a subject as to which Congress is given power to legislate this feeble effort has been all in vain.

Some suggestion has been made to the effect that the mandatory provisions run counter to the Constitution, but in what particular is left vague. There is no longer any doubt of the right of our Government to acquire new territory and to govern it. If we can exercise complete sovereignty over new lands for all time, it will be difficult to establish that we can not exercise a limited sovereignty for a limited time. Then it is offered that article 20, by which each signatory stipulates that it will not enter into a treaty inconsistent with the covenant, is void, because otherwise the treaty-making power would be limited. That condition arises in the case of every treaty made with two or more powers. In the case of every such treaty no new compact could be made with either or any of the other signatory powers inconsistent with the general treaty without violating it as to the party not participating in the later treaty. In effect the contention is that the United States may not enter into a treaty with two or more States.

Finally, referring to the dictum of Mr. Justice Field, quoted above, to the effect that the treaty-making power is not so extensive as to justify a treaty which makes a change in the character of the Government, it is urged that by reason of the large powers with which the league is invested the United States is transformed from an independent nation into a constituent subject member of a "supersovereignty" or "superstate." This is mere declamation. It may be said in passing that this particular limitation, pointed out by the learned justice, does not arise by reason of any peculiarity of the Constitution of this country. Such a limitation is implied in the case of the representatives of every nation to whom is intrusted the treaty-making power. Clemenceau could no more, through a treaty with some other power, transform France from a Republic into a monarchy than Wilson and the Senate could accomplish a like result as to the United States.

What are these "vast powers" that are conferred upon the league? I shall omit those which are arbitral in character, assuming that no one in this day will assert that the United States may not, consistently with the Constitution, enter into treaties of arbitration or that, in setting up a tribunal of arbitration, it surrenders any part of its sovereignty, or that it is in any sense violative of the Constitution to agree, on its part, faithfully to carry out the judgment and order of the arbitrators in the matter submitted.

By article 4 it is provided:

"The council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action or affecting the peace of the world."

But it is given no power to do anything. Obviously this clause merely charges the league with the duty of considering, advising, and recommending. To a certainty, our Government has not bound itself by that clause to do anything as it has, for instance, by article 10. That clause is clearly intended to make the league a forum in which the representatives of the various powers would be brought together to adjust differences that might result in war.

By article 8 the league is authorized to formulate plans for a reduction of armaments, the only power given to it, as heretofore pointed out, being to grant to any country after the plan has been adopted, authority to exceed the limit thereby fixed, a unanimous vote being required for the authorization.

By article 10 the league, through the council, "shall advise upon the means by which the obligation" into which the members enter shall fulfill the obligation thereby undertaken, namely, "to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and political independence of all members of the league."

Article 11 provides:

"Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations."

But what action can it take other than to endeavor to compose, to advise, or recommend? The league has no army to make war; it has no treasury to meet the expenses of war. It can not initiate a blockade, nor even lay an embargo. No nation has bound itself by any provision of the covenant to observe any directions that may be given it in the premises by the league or to follow any recommendations it may make. The same article provides:

"It is also declared to be the fundamental right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threaten to disturb either the peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends."

The observations made apply equally to these provisions.

By article 13 the members agree to submit international controversies to arbitration. "In the event of failure" on the part of any nation which has thus submitted a controversy in which it is interested to carry out the award made, "the council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto." As no nation has ever declined or omitted to comply with an award, this duty is not likely to be burdensome, but all the league can do in the premises is to "propose" the steps to be taken in order to give effect to the award. The very term used implies that the nations affected may or may not take the steps proposed. None of them agree to do so or to take any steps at all.

Article 14 authorizes the league to set up a permanent court of international justice, which may or may not be resorted to by any of the powers and which may be called upon for an opinion by the league.

By article 16 the council is authorized to recommend to the several governments concerned what effective military or naval forces the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armaments of forces to protect the covenants of the league should any member make war in disregard thereof. It may do likewise under article 17 should a nonmember resort to war against a member, the latter declining to accept special membership in the league for the consideration of the controversy, or, having done so, making war in violation of the covenant.

By article 22 the league assumes a supervisory control over new governments brought into being by the treaty and over the German colonies and other regions similarly situated, incapable of governing themselves, and undertakes to govern them, respectively, through members willing to undertake the task.

If full governmental authority may be exercised for all time over newly acquired territory consistently with the Constitution, how can it be doubted that a limited authority may be exercised for a limited time over regions not now a part of our possessions.

Article 23 speaks for itself, as follows:

"ART. 23. Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the members of the league (a) will endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women, and children both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organizations; (b) undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control; (c) will intrust the league with the general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs; (d) will intrust the league with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunitions with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest; (e) will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communication and of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all members of the league. In this connection the special necessities of the regions devastated during the war of 1914–1918 shall be in mind; (f) will endeavor to take steps in matters of international concern for the prevention and control of disease."

It is idle to assert that an organization thus equipped is a government at all. It has no army and no treasury, and no means of securing either. It is not even invested with authority to appoint a commander in chief, should the nation members, in accordance with the terms of the covenant take the field to force observance by a recalcitrant or to repel an attack made in violation of article 10. Though it may render decisions, it can not make laws, neither can it levy taxes. It deals with States as entities—not with individuals—negativing the idea that it is a government, according to Alexander Hamilton, who said, in urging the adoption of our Constitution:

"We must resolve to incorporate into our plan those ingredients which may be considered as forming the characteristic difference between a league and a government; we must extend the authority of the Union to the persons of our citizens—the only proper objects of government." (Federalist, No. 15.)

It may pass in this Chamber or on the hustings, but it is ventured that there is not a lawyer among us who would have the hardihood to contend before the Supreme Court of the United States in a proceeding to enjoin the expenditure of public funds to pay the salaries of our league representatives, or in some other cause in which the question might properly be raised, that the covenant is void because, in the language of Justice Field, it effects "a change in the character of the Government." Incidentally it may be remarked that no treaty has ever been held by the Supreme Court to be violative of the Constitution, either in whole or in part. * * *

EXCERPTS FROM THE SPEECH OF SENATOR FRANK B. KELLOGG, OF MINNESOTA, IN THE SENATE ON AUGUST 7, 1919.

TREATY-MAKING POWER AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, it is my intention at this time to address myself, at least partially, to the resolution heretofore submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] calling upon the Judiciary Committee of the Senate for an expression of opinion as to the constitutionality of the proposed treaty of alliance with France; and as that treaty embraces in principle the same questions as are involved in the league of nations, I beg leave of the Senate to submit some observations upon that question.

I shall at this time discuss two propositions: First, whether the league of nations is within the treaty-making power of the President and the Senate under the Constitution of the United States; and, second, whether reservations in and amendments of the covenant are necessary to protect the United States.

As an appendix to my remarks I ask to have printed in the RECORD some reservations which have been prepared by certain Senators as suggestions in relation to the pending treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

[The matter referred to will be found in Appendix A at the conclusion of Mr. KELLOGG'S speech.]

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the covenant of the league of nations has been before the people of the United States for practically six months. It has probably been discussed in the Senate, in the forum of the people, and in the press of the country more than any instrument ever submitted since the Jay treaty. I believe every Senator has made up his mind how he intends to vote.

The peace treaty, the most momentous document ever submitted to any body, has been before the Committee on Foreign Relations nearly a month; and, while I am making no criticism of that committee, I am stating what I believe to be the public sentiment of this country when I say that there is a strong desire that this treaty and the league of nations covenant, bringing an end of this war, shall be disposed of at the earliest possible moment. The Nation has made great sacrifices; its sons have given their lives upon the fields of France; industry and commerce have been disarranged; the people wish this issue settled and that our attention be turned to the economic problems which always follow a great world convulsion such as we have passed through.

I should not take the time of the Senate to discuss even these questions were it not for the fact that the peace treaty is still before the Foreign Relations Committee, and there is no legislation immediately pending before the Senate, since it is now being considered in the committees of Congress.

I am aware that the discussion of a constitutional question is a very dry subject and interests very few people, but I take it that no Senator desires or would for one moment think of voting for a treaty that he believes to be beyond the constitutional power of the Government simply because it would do no harm.

From an examination of the speeches made by certain Senators and from declarations in the press I assume that the provisions of the covenant which are declared to be in violation of the Constitution are:

Article 8, providing for the reduction of national armaments, and stipulating that the manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war is open to grave objection;

Article 10, providing that members of the league agree to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league;

Article 11, providing that any war or threat of war shall be a matter of concern to the whole league, and that the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations;

Article 16, providing that any member of the league resorting to war in disregard of its covenants under certain articles shall suffer the severance of all trade or financial relations and the prohibition of all intercourse by its nationals; and

Other provisions of the covenant providing for mandates in relation to the freedom in transit and equitable treatment of commerce.

I shall not now discuss the wisdom of these provisions—whether they should be amended or whether, if the treaty is ratified, certain reservations should be made which we believe will protect this country, although, perhaps, I ought to say that one of those questions I shall later consider in the course of my remarks. The immediate question, however, to which I now invite attention is the constitutional power of this Government to agree to respect or to guarantee the independence of any country or agree to the limitation of armament or make a treaty containing provisions which may affect our trade and commerce.

SOURCE AND SCOPE OF TREATY-MAKING POWER.

When the Constitution of the United States was adopted the treaty-making power was conferred upon the President and the Senate. The provisions of the Constitution are as follows:

"No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation. * * * (Art. I, sec. 10, cl. 1.)

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, * * * enter into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign power. * * * (Art. I, sec. 10, cl. 2.)

"He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. * * * (Art. II, sec. 2, cl. 2.)

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority. * * * (Art. III, sec. 2, cl. 1.)

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." (Art. VI, cl. 2.)

In this broad grant of power there is embodied no definition of the subjects embraced within the treaty-making power. It may, therefore, be accepted that the people of the United States intended to confer upon the Federal Government no less power than was at the time exercised and enjoyed by other nations. In fact, not only by practice, but by authority, the treaty-making power has been held to embrace all those subjects which it has been the practice and custom of nations to exercise. These include treaties of alliance, both offensive and defensive; guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity; agreements as to colonies; agreements to neutralize territories and nations; treaties affecting the status of foreign citizens in this country, their right to engage in business, to own, transfer, and inherit property; questions of customs and duties, navigation of rivers, lakes, and internal waterways; the limitation of armament; the acquisition of territoy; the settlement and payment of damages; and other subjects too numerous here to mention.

The men who framed the Constitution were versed in the history and practice of nations and in international law. They were students of government. Had it been intended to limit the sovereign power of the United States in the exercise of the usual treaty-making rights such restrictions would have been stated in the Constitution. In fact, in limiting the States it was provided that they should not enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation, but no limitation was placed in the Federal Constitution. It is impossible for me to recite to the Senate the declarations of the statesmen of that time in the formation of the Constitution and its adoption by the several States or the discussions which early in the history of this Government dwelt upon the treaty-making power. But those discussions make it perfectly clear that the Constitution was intended to confer upon the Federal Government the same general treaty-making power exercised by other nations, limited only by the express provisions of our Constitution. Furthermore, from the very inception of our Government to the present time we have placed a practical construction upon this power, and the Supreme Court of the United States has held that where there exists ambiguity or doubt, or where two views may well be entertained, contemporaneous and practical construction of constitutional powers are entitled to the greatest weight. (McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S., 1; Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S., 41.)

"TREATY OF ALLIANCE WITH FRANCE, 1778."

At the time the Constitution was adopted it was the practice of nations to enter into treaties of alliance, offensive and defensive; guarantee countries against internal aggression; enter into treaties of commerce affecting duties on exports as well as imports and regulating other phases of commerce; fixing the status of foreign citizens and defining their property rights; acquire territory or colonies; and exercise various other treaty-making powers. In fact, before our Constitution was adopted and during the struggle for independence the Confederation of States entered into a treaty with France for an offensive and defensive alliance. Article 1 of this treaty provided as follows:

"If war should break out between France and Great Britain during the continuance of the present war between the United States and England, His Majesty and the said United States shall make it a common cause and aid each other mutually with their good offices, their counsels, and their forces, according to the exigence of conjunctures, as becomes good and faithful allies."

Article 8 provides as follows:

"Neither of the two parties shall conclude either truce or peace with Great Britain without the formal consent of the other first obtained; and they mutually engage not to lay down their arms until the independence of the United States shall have been formally or tacitly assured by the treaty or treaties that shall terminate the war."

Article 11, in part, provides as follows:

"The two parties guarantee mutually from the present time and forever against all powers, to wit, the United States to His Most Christian Majesty, the present possessions of the Crown of France in America as well as those which it may acquire in the future treaty of peace. And His Most Christian Majesty guarantees on his part to the United States their liberty, sovereignty, and independence."

This treaty was in existence until 1798 and subsisted after the adoption of the Constitution. Hamilton, in his letters discussing the treaty-making power under the Federation and under the Constitution, referred to this treaty as an evidence of the power granted by the Constitution of the United States to enter into a treaty of alliance. Among other things, he said:

"The manner of exercising a similar power under the confederation shall now be examined.

"To judge of the similarity of the power it will be useful to quote the terms in which it was granted. They are these: 'The United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of entering into treaties and alliances: Provided, That no treaty of commerce shall be made whereby the legislative power of the respective States shall be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners as their own people are subject to, or from prohibiting the importation or exportation of any species of commodities whatsoever.'

"It will not be disputed that the words 'treaties and alliances' are of equivalent import and of no greater force than the single word 'treaties.' An alliance is only a species of treaty, a particular of a general; and the power of 'entering into treaties,' which terms confer the authority under which the former Government acted, will not be pretended to be stronger than the power 'to make treaties,' which are the terms constituting the authority under which the present Government acts; it follows that the power respecting treaties under the former and that under the present Government are similar.

* * * * * * *

"Under this power thus granted and defined the alliance with France was contracted, guaranteeing, in the case of a defensive war, her West India possessions, and when the casus fœderis occurs obliging the United States to make war for the defense of those possessions, and consequently to incur the expenses of war.

"Under the same power treaties of commerce were made with France, the Netherlands, Sweden, and Prussia. Besides that, every treaty of commerce is necessarily a regulation of commerce between the parties, it has been shown, in the antecedent comparison of those treaties with that lately negotiated, that produce the specific effects of restraining the legislative power from imposing higher or other duties on the articles of those nations than on the like articles of other nations, and from extending prohibition to them which shall not equally extend to other nations the most favored; and thus abridge the exercise of the legislative power to tax and the exercise of the legislative power to regulate trade."

JAY TREATY, 1794.

During the time the Constitution was pending before the conventions of the various States for adoption, much of the objection to the Constitution emanated from the extensive treaty-making power conferred upon the President and the Senate. All students of history will recall the storm of opposition and public indignation which swept over the country when the terms of the Jay treaty, proclaimed February 29, 1796, between Great Britain and the United States, were made public. All of the latent opposition to the Constitution was fanned into a flame and public meetings were held all over the country, at which the treaty was denounced. It was assailed in almost every aspect as being beyond the constitutional power of the President and the Senate.

It brought forth from Washington, Hamilton, Ellsworth, and many others who were familiar with the history of the formation of the Constitution and the grant of the treaty-making power the most illuminating and the ablest discussion upon this subject anywhere recorded in history.

Hamilton defended the treaty-making power in a series of letters over the signature of "Camillus," which for historical knowledge and power of logic have never been transcended. They stand as the last great monument to his fame. A brief summary of these objections may be useful.

It was alleged that the Jay treaty restricted the power of Congress to lay taxes or exact higher duties upon commodities; the power to regulate trade; the power to establish uniform naturalization; to define and punish piracies and felonies; that is violated the provision of the Constitution which declares that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law"; that it violated the constitutional power of Congress to dispose of and make uniform rules and regulations respecting territory and other property of the United States; that it violated that provision of the Constitution relating to the judicial department, and in many other respects.

In discussing these objections, Hamilton said:

"The power of treaty could not but be supposed commensurate with all these objects to which the legislative power of the Union extended, which are the proper subjects of compacts with foreign nations."

In discussing the understanding of the treaty-making power by the convention, Hamilton said:

"The manner in which the power of treaty, as it exists in the Constitution, was understood by the convention in framing it and by the people in adopting it is the point next to be considered.

"As to the sense of the convention, the secrecy with which their deliberations were conducted does not permit any formal proof of the opinions and views which prevailed in digesting the power of the treaty, but from the best opportunity of knowing the fact I aver that it was understood by all to be the intent of the provision to give to that power the most ample latitude—to render it competent to all the stipulations which the exigencies of national affairs might require; competent to the making of treaties of alliance, treaties of commerce, treaties of peace, and every other species of convention usual among nations; and competent in the course of its exercise for these purposes, to control and bind the legislative power of Congress, and it was emphatically for this reason that it was so carefully guarded, the cooperation of two-thirds of the Senate with the President being required to make any treaty whatever. I appeal for this with confidence to every member of the convention, particularly to those in the two Houses of Congress."

In summarizing the arguments of those who objected to the Jay treaty on constitutional grounds, he enumerated the various treaties which the United States could not enter into if the position of these objectors was correct:

"The absurdity of the alleged interferences will fully appear by showing how they would operate upon the several kinds of treaties usual among nations. These may be classed under three principal heads: (1) Treaties of commerce, (2) treaties of alliance, (3) treaties of peace.

"Treaties of commerce are, of course, excluded, for every treaty of commerce is a system of rules devised to regulate and govern the trade between contracting nations, invading directly the exclusive power of regulating trade which is attributed to Congress.

"Treaties of alliance, whether defensive or offensive, are equally excluded, and this on two grounds:

"1. Because it is their immediate object to define a case or cases in which one nation shall take part with another in war, contrary, in the sense of the objection, to that clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power of declaring war; and (2) because the succors stipulated, in whatever shape they may be, must involve an expenditure of money—not to say that it is common to stipulate succors in money, either in the first instance or by way of alternative. It will be pertinent to observe, incidentally, in this place that even the humane and laudable provision in the seventeenth article, which all have approved, is within the spirit of the objection, for the effect of this is to restrain the power and discretion of Congress to grant reprisals till there has been an unsuccessful demand of justice. Nothing can better illustrate the unreasonable tendency of the principle.

"Treaties of peace are also excluded, or, at least, are so narrowed as to be in the greatest number of cases impracticable. The most common conditions of these treaties are restitutions or cessions of territory, on one side or on the other, frequently on both sides—regulations of boundary, restitutions and confirmations of property, pecuniary indemnifications for injuries or expenses. It will probably not be easy to find a precedent of a treaty of peace which does not contain one or more of these provisions as the basis of the cessation of hostilities, and they are all of them naturally to be looked for in an agreement which is to put an end to the state of war between conflicting nations.

"Yet they are all precluded by the objections which have been enumerated: Pecuniary indemnifications, by that which respects the appropriations of money; restitutions or cessions of territory or property, regulations of boundary, by that which respects the right of Congress to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations concerning the territory and property of the United States. It is to be observed likewise that cessions of territory are almost always accompanied with stipulations in favor of those who inhabit the ceded territory, securing personal privileges and private rights of property, neither of which could be acceded to on the principles of that objection, which relates to the power of naturalization, for this power has reference to two species of rights, those of privilege and those of property. An act allowing a foreigner to hold real estate is so far an act of naturalization, since it is one of the consequences of alienism not to be able to hold real estate.

"It follows that if the objections which are taken to the treaty on the point of constitutionality are valid, the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, can make neither a treaty of commerce nor alliance, and rarely, if at all, a treaty of peace. It is probable that on a minute analysis there is scarcely any species of treaty which would not clash in some particular with the principle of those objections, and thus, as was before observed, the power to make treaties granted in such comprehensive and indefinite terms and guarded with so much precaution would become esentially nugatory.

* * * * * * *

"But the construction which is combated would cause the legislative power to destroy the power of making treaties. Moreover, if the power of the executive department be inadequate to the making of the several kinds of treaties which have been mentioned, there is then no power in the Government to make them, for there is not a syllable in the Constitution which authorizes either the legislative or judiciary departments to make a treaty with a foreign nation. And our Constitution would then exhibit the ridiculous spectacle of a Government without a power to make treaties with foreign nations, a result as inadmissible as it is absurd, since, in fact, our Constitution grants the power of making treaties in the most explicit and ample terms to the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. On the contrary, all difficulty is avoided by distinguishing the province of the two powers according to ideas which have been always familiar to us, and which were never exposed to any questions till the treaty with Great Britain gave exercise to subtleties of party spirit."

Chief Justice Ellsworth, who had been a member of the Federal convention and whose appointment to the Supreme Bench bears date of March 4, 1796, in a carefully prepared letter on the subject, under date of March 13, 1796, expressed similar views. He said:

"The grant of the treaty-making power is in these words: 'The President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall make treaties.' The power goes to all kinds of treaties, because no exception is expressed, and also because no treaty-making power is elsewhere granted to others, and it is not to be supposed that the Constitution has omitted to vest sufficient power to make all kinds of treaties which have been usually made or which the existence or interests of the Nation may require."

PRECEDENTS AND AUTHORITIES RESPECTING TREATY-MAKING POWER AND SUBJECTS.

We will thus see that the understanding of those who framed and were instrumental in adopting the Constitution was that this country had power to enter into the usual treaties negotiated by sovereign powers, including treaties of alliance, treaties guaranteeing the political independence and integrity of foreign nations; in fact, this country had entered into such a treaty, which was in force before the Constitution was adopted and for years thereafter; that from that day to the present time no question has been raised respecting the power of this country to negotiate such a treaty. Not only is this supported by the best writers on constitutional law, but by the decisions of the Supreme Court and the practice of this country during the entire life of the Republic.

Willoughby, recognized as one of the best of the modern authorities on constitutional law, makes the following statement concerning the treaty-making power of the Federal Government:

"The control of international relations vested in the General Government is not only exclusive but all-comprehensive. That is to say, the authority of the United States in its dealings with the foreign powers includes not only those powers which the Constitution specifically grants it, but all those powers which sovereign States in general possess with regard to matters of international concern. This general authority in the United States is fairly deducible from the fact that in its dealings with other States the United States appear as the sole representative of the American people; that upon it rests, therefore, the obligation to perform all the duties which international law imposed upon a sovereign State; and that, therefore, having these duties to perform it is to be presumed to have commensurate powers. (Sec. 190.)

"The power being expressly conferred by the Constitution on the President and Senate to make treaties, and there being no bounds set to their power, they are without limitation, except that they can not violate other provisions of the Constitution or invade the other departments of the Government."

In the case of Ferrioa dos Santos (2 Brock., 493), cited in Second Watson, on the Constitution, page 955, it is said:

"The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited, except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and of that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter without its consent. (Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. v. Lowe, 114 U. S., 525, 541.) But with these exceptions it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country." (Per Field, J., in Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S., 258, 266.)

In the same opinion it is said:

"That the treaty power of the United States extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our Government and the Governments of other nations is clear."

In Holmes v. Jennison (14 Pet. U. S., 540) Chief Justice Taney, writing the opinion of the court, said:

"The power to make treaties is given by the Constitution in general terms, without any description of the objects intended to be embraced by it, and consequently it was designated to include all those subjects which in the ordinary intercourse of nations had usually been made subjects of negotiation and treaty and which are consistent with the nature of our institutions and the distribution of powers between the General and State Governments. And without attempting to define the exact limits of this treaty-making power or to enumerate the subjects intended to be included in it, it may safely be assumed that the recognition and enforcement of the principles of public law being one of the ordinary subjects of treaties, were necessarily included in the power conferred on the General Government. * * * Indeed, the whole frame of the Constitution supports this construction" (pp. 569–570).

In the case of The Cherokee Tobacco (11 Wall., 616) Judge Swayne said, at page 620:

"It need hardly be said that a treaty can not change the Constitution or be held valid if it be in violation of that instrument. This results from the nature and fundamental principles of our Government. The effect of treaties and acts of Congress, when in conflict, is not settled by the Constitution. But the question is not involved in any doubt as to its proper solution. A treaty may supersede a prior act of Congress (Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet., 314) and an act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty (Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curtis, 454; The Clinton Bridge, 1 Walworth, 155)."

In Holden v. Joy (17 Wall., 243) Clifford, J., said:

"Under the powers given to the President and Senate to make treaties, it must be assumed that the framers of the Constitution intended that the power should extend to all those objects which in the intercourse of nations had usually been regarded as the proper subjects of negotiation and treaty, if not inconsistent with the nature of our Government and the relations between the States and the United States."

In Holmes v. Jennison (14 Pet., 569) it was said:

"The Constitution does not descend to details on the subject of treaties. It confers the power upon the President and Senate to make treaties, and this power is conferred in general and not specific terms. The power therefore includes all those matters which were the subjects of treaty at the time the Constitution was formed, providing they are consistent with the nature and provisions of the Constitution. The recognition and enforcement of the principles of public law being among the ordinary subjects of treaties were of necessity included in the power conferred upon the President and Senate to make treaties." (Cited in 2 Watson on the Constitution, p. 956.)

It is hardly necessary to enumerate the treaties involving such general provisions which have been entered into by the United States during its existence under the Constitution. Familiar examples are the Rush-Bagot agreement of 1817—made by the exchange of notes—whereby the United States and Great Britain agreed to limit their naval armament upon the Lakes forming the boundaries between the United States and Canada.

The Webster-Ashburton treaty of 1842, whereby Great Britain and the United States agreed to maintain a naval force on the coast of Africa for the suppression of the slave trade, the forces of the two nations to act in concert and cooperation.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, between Great Britain and the United States, relating to the subject of a ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, the two nations guaranteeing the neutrality of the canal and undertaking to protect it against unjust confiscation, seizure, or violence, and so forth.

The treaty of 1846 with Colombia, whereby the United States guaranteed "positively and efficaciously * * * to perfect neutrality" of the Isthmus of Panama, the treaty with Cuba, and the treaty by which we guaranteed the independence of Panama.

The treaty of 1889 with Germany and Great Britain respecting the Samoan Islands, and many others.

The treaties of arbitration are so well known that no reference is necessary. The two Hague conventions, the Hay treaties made following the first convention, and the Root treaties following the second, and, finally, the Bryan treaties of 1913, dealt so comprehensively with the whole subject of arbitration as to leave no doubt whatever concerning the uniform recognition of the ability of the treaty-making power to bind the United States to any form of agreement for the peaceful settlement of international disputes, with a corresponding covenant not to go to war over the subject of dispute until after the processes of arbitration or inquiry have been exhausted, so that, upon precedent, upon the testimony of the statesmen who framed the Constitution, and in practice there can be no doubt as to the power of this Nation to execute such guaranties, whatever may be its wisdom. In principle there is no difference between guaranteeing the independence of Panama and guaranteeing the independence of Great Britain or France. It is said that we have a proprietary interest in Panama on account of the construction of the canal. We have a proprietary interest in the canal, and it is to our benefit to have stable government on either side of the canal, and so it is to our interest to have stable governments in any country contiguous to the United States or in any part of the world which might otherwise threaten our peace. For that reason we practically guaranteed the independence of Cuba.

If this country had the power to negotiate a treaty of alliance with France—and that power has not been questioned for more than a hundred years—the power still subsists.

If we had power to enter into a treaty with Great Britain to limit armament upon the Great Lakes—the treaty with Great Britain, 1817, which power has not been questioned for more than a hundred years—we have the same power to agree with all nations at this time to limit our armament.

Another objection to the treaty is that Congress alone can declare war and establish an army and navy; that therefore it is within the sole province of Congress to decide whether we will declare war to protect a foreign country or whether we will enlist a certain number of men and provide a certain army; that, as the legislative power is alone vested in Congress, only Congress can enter into such an agreement; and that any agreement the violation of which might cause war, or any agreement to limit armament which Congress might violate, is unconstitutional. This, as Hamilton says, would practically destroy the treaty-making power of the United States.

The argument is as old as the history of treaties in this country. It was presented with great ability by the opponents of the Jay treaty and overcome by the able statesmen of that time, foremost among whom was Alexander Hamilton. From that day to the present time the question has been frequently raised in connection with treaties for the payment of money, regulating commerce, fixing import duties, regulating rights of trade with foreign countries, fixing boundaries, and various other subjects; the objection being that as the power to legislate in relation to these matters was in the entire Congress, any treaty made by the President and the Senate was therefore void. But these objections have proved unavailing and a large number of treaties have been made and ratified by the Senate where legislation was necessary to carry them into operation. For those who desire a more detailed examination of these treaties they will be found stated and analyzed in Crandall on Treaties, their making and enforcement, chapters 12 to 17, inclusive.

I can not review them all, but let me discuss a few of them:

The Jay treaty provided for the payment of money, regulated commerce, and fixed the status of foreign citizens, their right to hold and inherit property in the States, and other like provisions. President Washington took the advice of the heads of his administration—of Hamilton and others—and declined to submit the treaty to the House of Representatives.

On March 30, 1796, in his reply to a resolution from the House, President Washington said:

"As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty, as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself all the objects requiring legislative provisions, and on these, the papers called for can throw no light, and as it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between different departments should be preserved, a just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case, forbids a compliance with your request."

The treaty with France for the purchase of land at the mouth of the Mississippi, approved May 3, 1802, required an appropriation of $2,000,000. President Jefferson submitted the treaty to the Senate alone, and after its ratification asked Congress to make the appropriation. A resolution requesting the President to submit the papers to the House of Representatives was defeated.

In the French treaty of July 4, 1831, it was agreed to pay to the United States 25,000,000 francs in settlement of certain claims. The treaty was signed by the French Government and the representatives of the United States and ratified by the Senate. The Chamber of Deputies of France refused to make the appropriation. The House of Representatives unanimously adopted a resolution declaring that in the opinion of the House the convention should be maintained and its execution insisted upon.

So that we ourselves have not only insisted that we have the right to make a treaty which is said to circumscribe the legislative or sovereign power of the Government, but we have invoked the same rule against others.

There are a number of these treaties entered into with the United States requiring the payment of money which have never been submitted to the Congress and which have been negotiated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. A list of these may be found on page 179, Crandall on Treaties, extending from 1796 to 1903.

In treaties involving the modification of revenue laws it has been the universal custom for the President and the Senate to negotiate such treaties, although the power to raise revenue is alone vested in the Congress, and such bills must originate in the House. This question was also determined as an incident to the Jay treaty. The discussion is very illuminating. John Forsyth, who was afterwards Secretary of State, instituted the contention in the House that legislation to administer the treaty was necessary, but he made no claim that the treaty itself was invalid. His statement is so clear on this question that I beg leave to quote therefrom:

"The basis of the bill is not the principle stated, that legislative aid is necessary to the validity of treaties. Gentlemen have exhausted their ingenuity, their time, and their eloquence in the discussion of a doctrine utterly denied by the bill and those who advocate it. The doctrine contended for is that in certain cases specified by the Constitution legislative aid is necessary to the execution of treaties. Is there no difference between the two propositions? * * * The distinction between the validity of an instrument and the execution of its provisions, between the obligation of contract and the performance of that obligation? * * * We insist not that it is the figment or shadow of a treaty but that it shall be neither more nor less than a treaty valid and obligatory as such as a contract, but not having the force of law in its operation upon the municipal concerns of this people without legislative enactment."

He makes a distinction between the carrying out of a treaty and the making of a treaty which is morally binding upon the Congress.

Heretofore there has been no tribunal in which such treaties could be judged, except the tribunal of public opinion.

The treaties with France in 1822 and 1831 providing for duties on French goods admitted into the United States were ratified and then submitted to Congress for legislation. But the Senate refused to ratify the treaty with the States of the German Zollverein, which changed the duties laid by law. Since 1854 many of the treaties affecting import duties contained a proviso that the treaty should take effect as soon as laws required to carry them into operation should be passed. For instance, in convention with Hawaiian Islands of 1875, the Senate advised ratification, "but not until a law to carry it into operation shall be passed by the Congress of the United States." A similar reservation was made in the reciprocity convention with Mexico of 1883 and various other reciprocity conventions subsequently negotiated.

In the tariff act of October 3, 1913, the President was "authorized and empowered to negotiate trade agreements with foreign nations wherein mutual concessions are made looking toward freer trade relations and further reciprocal expansion of trade and commerce: Provided, however, That said trade agreements before becoming operative shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for ratification or rejection."

Whatever may be said respecting the propriety of the negotiation of a treaty by the President and the Senate which interferes with the tariff acts enacted by Congress, the power to negotiate such treaties is settled beyond question. My own opinion is that the wisdom of it is doubtful, and as the duty is placed upon Congress to raise revenue to support the Government, the treaty-making power should not be exercised in such a way as to infringe upon this authority. But it has been the practice of this Nation from the inauguration of its Government under the Constitution to negotiate such treaties and to simply ask Congress to pass the necessary legislation to carry them into operation.

The Supreme Court, in the so-called Insular cases, settled this question. In the case of De Lima v. Bidwell (182 U. S., 1) recovery was sought for duties paid under protest on goods brought into New York from the island of Porto Rico in 1899, after the exchange of ratification of the treaty but prior to any legislation by Congress. The court held that upon the exchange of ratification of the treaty of April 11, 1899, Porto Rico ceased to be a foreign country within the meaning of the tariff laws then existing, and that the duties were not legally exacted. That, in effect, was a repeal of the tariff laws by this treaty.

In the Fourteen Diamond Ring case (173 U. S., 176) the same decision was reached as to the Philippine Islands. It is true, however, that in the De Lima case there was the dissenting opinion of four judges, written by Mr. Justice White, to the contrary. But the De Lima case has been reaffirmed and must now be considered as the settled law of this country. This case was cited and approved in Dorr v. United States (195 U. S., 138), and has been cited with approval by the Supreme Court since that time.

Chief Justice White based his dissent upon the ground that it was not good policy for the Government to execute a treaty affecting duties, because the responsibility for raising revenue to support the Government was placed upon the Congress. But the court held the question of propriety was for the Senate and the President to determine when they made the treaty, Congress clearly reserving the right to refuse to carry it out or to repeal the treaty if it saw fit.

In the latter case, Mr. Justice Day, who delivered the opinion of the court, said:

"It may be regarded as settled that the Constitution of the United States is the only source of power authorizing action by any branch of the Federal Government. 'The Government of the United States was born of the Constitution, and all powers which it enjoys or may exercise must be either derived expressly or by implication from that instrument.' (Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S., 244, 288) and cases cited.) It is equally well settled that the United States may acquire territory in the exercise of the treaty-making power by direct cession as the result of war and in making effectual the terms of peace, and for that purpose has the powers of other sovereign nations. This principle has been recognized by this court from its earliest decisions. The convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, in view of the territory already possessed and the possibility of acquiring more, inserted in that instrument, in Article IV, section 3, a grant of express power to Congress 'to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.'"

There is no question that the power to acquire territory, to fix boundaries and the status of the inhabitants, and to cede territory has not only been exercised many times by this Government but has been sustained as a part of the treaty-making power by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, in his speech of March 1, objects to certain articles of the treaty relating to finance and economy because the power to legislate upon interstate commerce is vested in Congress. This same objection was made to the Jay treaty and was met by the President and by many of the proponents of the treaty, conspicuous among whom was Alexander Hamilton. Hamilton said:

"This will the better appear from the entire clause. 'The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes,' which is the same as if it had been said: The whole powers of regulating trade by law shall reside in Congress, except as to the trade within a State, the power to regulate which shall remain with such State. But it is clearly foreign to that mutual regulation of trade between the United States and other nations, which, from the necessity of mutual consent, can only be performed by treaty. It is, indeed, an absurdity to say that the power of regulating trade by law is incompatible with the power of regulating it by treaty, since the former can by no means do what the latter alone can accomplish; consequently it is an absurdity to say that the legislative power of regulating trade is an exception to the power of making treaties.

"Laws are the acts of legislation of a particular nation for itself. Treaties are the acts of the legislation of several nations for themselves jointly and reciprocally. The legislative powers of one State can not reach the cases which depend on the joint legislation of two or more States. For this resort must be had to the pactitious power, or the power of treaty. This is another attitude of the subject, displaying the fallacy of the proposition that the legislative powers of Congress are exceptions to or limitations of the power of the President, with the aid of the Senate, to make treaties."

SUPERIORITY OF TREATIES OVER STATE LAWS.

There is no doubt that in the absence of a treaty or legislation by Congress the States have power to establish the status of foreign citizens as to their rights to hold and inherit property and to engage in business within their several borders. And Congress undoubtedly has the power to provide for the naturalization of foreign subjects and prescribe conditions under which they shall become citizens of the United States. Notwithstanding this, it is settled beyond dispute that the Federal Government may by treaty define the status of a foreign subject residing within the States, and indicate the plans where he may travel, the business in which he may engage, the property he may own, both real and personal, and the disposition of such property upon his death; that such a treaty constitutes the supreme law of the land; that a State law contravening such a treaty is invalid and will be so declared by the courts in a suitable action. Certain it is that Congress may pass a law setting aside such a treaty, and that a treaty may be negotiated which shall supersede a law of Congress.

These propositions have been established by the laws of all civilized nations, by the history of all eras, by the opinion of statesmen who framed our Constitution, by the provisions of the Constitution, by the universal practice of negotiating such treaties, and, finally, by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and many of the State courts during a period exceeding 100 years.

If the President and the Senate can make a treaty providing for the disposition of land in a State, they may make a treaty affecting foreign commerce, continually conceding the power of Congress to denounce the treaty.

Under the Articles of Confederation the Congress entered into treaties with foreign Governments defining the status of foreign citizens within the several States, and their right to engage in business, and to own, dispose of, and inherit property, both real and personal. Such treaties were made with France, the Netherlands, Sweden, Great Britain, Morocco, and Prussia. (Treaty with France, Feb. 6, 1778, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 12; treaty with the State's General of United Netherlands, Oct. 28, 1782, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 32; treaty of peace with Great Britain, Nov. 30, 1782, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 54; treaty with Sweden, Apr. 3, 1783, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 60; treaty with Prussia, Sept., 1785, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 84; treaty with Morocco, Jan. 7, 1787, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 100.)

Since the adoption of the Constitution many treaties of this character have been made, such as the treaty with the Republic of Salvador in 1870 (Treaties and Conventions, p. 1537); the treaty with Peru, 1871 (Treaties and Conventions, p. 1431). In fact, nearly every one of our treaties contain provisions, varying in form, regulating some matter which is ordinarily within the jurisdiction of the State, and which, by the Constitution, is not committed to Congress other than by the treaty-making power.

That such treaties are valid and superior to the laws of the States is demonstrated by the discussions which occurred at the time the Constitution was adopted.

Time does not permit me to cite the expressions of the public men of that time, of Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Madison, Randolph, Pinckney, Adams, Wilson, together with the remarkable discussion of the Constitution by Hamilton, Madison, and Jay in the Federalist—a discussion which excited the admiration of statesmen the world over and compares favorably with the writings of such great students of government as Vattel, Montesquieu, Burke, Machiavelli, and Rousseau.

It is only necessary for me to cite to the Senate the various decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, holding that these treaties were not only within the treaty-making power of the Senate and the President, but were superior to the laws of the various States.

Many of these decisions were rendered in the early days of the Republic, were participated in by men who were members of the Constitutional Convention and familiar with the history of the times and the objects to be attained by its adoption. I shall simply give the Senate a list of the leading cases, as follows: Elizabeth Rutgers v. Joshua Waddington, in the Mayor's Court of New York, 1784; Ware v. Hylton (3 Dall., 199); Chirac v. Chirac (2 Wheat., 259); Orr v. Hodgson (4 Wheat., 453); Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee (7 Cr., 603); Hughes v. Edwards (9 Wheat., 489); Hauenstein v. Lynham (100 U. S., 483); Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S., 263).

There have also been adjudicated cases to the same effect in the United States circuit and district courts, and a large number of cases in the State courts. In fact, every State which has passed on the question has followed the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This is also the opinion of substantially all of the writers upon the treaty-making power, with one exception—Henry St. George Tucker, of Virginia—and he bases his opinion very largely upon certain expressions contained in certain decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, notably in opinions rendered by Chief Justice Taney, in 1840, in Homes v. Jennison (14 Pet., 540); of Justice Daniel, shortly after, in the License cases (5 How., 504); and Chief Justice Taney and Justice Grier in the Passenger cases (7 How., 283), tending to support the theory that the treaty-making power does not extend to the subjects which by the Constitution are ordinarily committed to the relative jurisdiction of the States. In all of these cases there were opinions by several of the justices of the court, and it does not appear that the language used was approved by the majority. In fact, in the Passenger cases the language of Chief Justice Taney was used in a dissenting opinion. These decisions, however, do not purport to overrule the earlier decisions of the court to the contrary, and have never been followed by the court since that time. They were rendered at a time, now happily past, when the country was divided by an overwhelming issue which darkened the political sky and clouded the judgment of men. This undoubtedly had its effect upon the decisions of that great court, but the later decisions have dispelled whatever doubt may have existed.

CONSTITUTIONAL EXCEPTIONS TO TREATY-MAKING POWER.

It may be said, however, that if there are no implied limitations to the treaty-making power, the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, might dismember the Union, abolish the structure of government guaranteed by the Constitution, or convey away the territory of the States. In fact, the Senator from Pennsylvania, in his speech on June 17, said that under the treaty-making power King George of England could not be made President of the United States, nor could the House of Lords be substituted for and perform the functions of the Senate of the United States, nor could the House of Commons be made to take the place of the House of Representatives.

But these arguments are not new. They were advanced time and time again in the Constitutional Convention and in the convention of the various States called to consider the adoption of the Constitution.

The same argument was advanced against the Jay treaty. In reply, Hamilton said:

"The only constitutional exception to the power of making treaties is that it shall not change the Constitution; which results from this fundamental maxim, that a delegated authority can not alter the constituting act unless so expressly authorized by the constituting power. An agent can not new model his own commission. A treaty, for example, can not transfer the legislative power to the executive department nor the power of this last department to the judiciary; in other words, it can not stipulate that the President, and not Congress, shall make laws for the United States; that the judges, and not the President, shall command the national forces."

Undoubtedly the treaty-making power does not comprehend that the President and the Senate shall change the form of government or stipulate to destroy any of the fundamental powers of the Federal Government which are guaranteed by provisions of the Federal Constitution coordinately with the treaty clause.

A treaty abrogating the functions of the Supreme Court of the United States or of the legislative or executive bodies would undoubtedly be declared unconstitutional, because the provisions of the Constitution creating the departments of Government are of equal force and effect with those conferring the treaty-making power.

These questions, if not settled by ballot, can only be settled by the arbitrament of war.

This question has been settled and these limitations carefully defined by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S., 258).

But because a treaty limits sovereign power—I speak of sovereign power as the power to make laws—it is not thereby invalid. The treaty-making power as between nations embraces many of the subjects which are within the legislative power of the Nation. Every treaty we negotiate to a certain extent destroys certain freedom of sovereign action. A treaty, of which we have many, conferring certain privileges of trade is binding, and if we perform our agreement it limits legislative action. Treaties fixing duties and providing for imports; navigation treaties; treaties defining the status of foreign subjects, their right to own and hold property; in fact, there is not a treaty which does not to some extent limit the power of the Federal Government. Of course, it is conceded that Congress has the power to violate a treaty, and we have denounced some of our treaties. And the Supreme Court has decided that a treaty can not alter the Constitution and is void if it is in violation of that instrument. (Thomas v. Gay, 169 U. S., 264.)

But it is an entirely different proposition when Congress agrees to a treaty that may cause war. The violation of many of our treaties might cause war if the other party to the treaty so desired. Congress has no power, of course, to create a supergovernment and confer upon that government the right, without an act of Congress, to declare war.

But it is an entirely different proposition when Congress agrees to a treaty the violation of which may lead to war. By the guaranty of the political integrity of Panama, if we perform that guaranty, it may become necessary to render military service. The treaty itself, however, is valid. We can not, of course, confer upon Panama the power to declare war for the United States, but we can agree with Panama to perform acts which may involve us in war.

It is claimed that we can not enter into a treaty limiting armament, because Congress alone can raise and support armies and provide for a navy. By a treaty with Great Britain, negotiated in 1817, we agreed to limit armament on the Great Lakes. This treaty has been in existence more than 100 years, and no question has ever arisen as to its validity. If we may limit armament in a certain section we may limit it entirely. Whether it is advisable to do so is another question. It must also be remembered that we have negotiated a large number of treaties within the last 10 years, by which we agree to arbitration and to forego hostilities for periods of from three to six months. These are agreements not to make war. If the contention of certain Senators is correct that a treaty in which it is agreed to forego hostilities is void because the Congress has absolute power to declare war at any time, we have for many years been performing unconstitutional acts. In fact, any treaty would be void which Congress may violate by legislative act or which requires a legislative act before it becomes operative. * * *

REPORT ON BALTIC PROVINCES (S. DOC. NO. 105).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have here the official report on the Baltic Provinces by Robert Hale, who was the legal adviser of the Paris peace commission on those provinces and who visited them. It is a very valuable document and I should like to have it printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

"WHY AMERICA IS FREE."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times under date of September 21, 1919, entitled "Why America is Free."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, Sept. 21, 1919.]

"WHY AMERICA IS FREE.

"Would it not be a good idea to reprint The Federalist and invite the attention of reviewers and the public in general to it as a new and remarkable work, shedding some light on American institutions? Might it not be well to do the same with Elliot's Debates and the correspondence of Thomas Jefferson? These questions are not asked ironically. The astonishing and humiliating fact has been forced upon the attention of Americans that the foundation principles of our Nation are unknown to or scoffed at by a large number of people who call themselves by the American name, but apparently have no idea of the theory of the Government under which they live.

"It may be that it was a hundred years or more ago that Percy Bysshe Shelley described this country:

> "'That land is like an eagle, whose young gaze
> Feeds on the noontide beam, whose golden plume
> Floats moveless on the storm, and in the blaze
> Of sunrise gleams when earth is wrapped in gloom;
> An epitaph of glory for the tomb
> Of murdered Europe may thy fame be made.
> Great people! as the sands shalt thou become;
> Thy growth is swift as morn when night must fade;
> The multitudinous earth shall sleep beneath thy shade.
> Yea, in the desert there is built a home
> For freedom. Genius is made strong to rear
> The monuments of man beneath the dome
> Of a new heaven; myriads assemble there,
> Whom the proud lords of man, in rage or fear,
> Drive from their wasted homes.
> * * * * * * *
> Nay, start not at the name—America!'

"If Shelley's mournful ghost could see the use which has been made of the opportunities which, as he thus glowingly told, the New World held out to the refugees of the old, what would he say? It would have been the puncturing of another of those dreams for the future of humanity which were so close to his heart. The United States was all that he said of it. There was, however, no magic in it. It was indeed a home of freedom and a city of refuge for the oppressed of all the world, but it was by no accident. It was because Americans everywhere understood the foundations on which their liberties rested and expected newcomers to learn what they themselves knew.

"The theory of our liberty, under which we have lived for a century and a quarter, was not that liberty meant anarchy or the rule of a class. It definitely excluded both. It limited the power of government and delegated to government only certain powers. It made such keen and careful provision that by no means could any group or faction obtain control of government. It was a theory which did not merely ignore classes, but took care that they should not exist, or, if they did, that no class could gain the reins of rulership. This it did by separating the powers of government. It balanced one power against another—a system of 'checks and balances,' to use the old phrase.

"It went further. It placed the legislative power in the hands of representatives of no class, men chosen for the purpose from all ranks of life by the people themselves. It provided, when it came down from theory to actual solidified enactment, that the representatives of the people should never take away from the people certain individual and personal rights, which the Constitution named in the most definite way. It provided that these principles should never be infringed either by the States or the Nation, and it created a judiciary to guard that provision.

"So there was nothing nebulous, vague, or intangible about American freedom. The Constitution, whose birthday the Nation celebrated a few days ago, was no glorious spree of words like the French declaration of the rights of man. It was made up of hard and practical declarations, and we have lived by them ever since. Now we are told suddenly that a new charter of human liberty has been discovered, and are invited to take it as our guide and sail unknown seas uttering invocations in its name. The old Constitution served us well. It served well the men who came here from other countries. Now that it is suddenly assailed by some among them who have been at no pains to learn what the instrument means, what the principles of our Government are, and by their intellectual blood relatives of American descent, the men and women who love it and believe in it should awake and stand by it."

COMMERCE AND FINANCES OF ENGLAND, FRANCE, AND ITALY.

Mr. OWEN. I have in my hand items showing the steps which are being taken by England, France, and Italy to rehabilitate and reconstruct their commerce and finances, including a short compilation by the National City Bank, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

It will be seen that the inflated currency of Italy will be retired by a loan, in the nature of a legal tax, and the currency brought back to normal. A great advance forward in the resumption of specie payment. These 2½ per cent bonds can thus absorb the redundant currency of Italy. Doubtless the other nations will follow the example of Italy and the great mischief of inflation ended in France, Belgium, and the other nations of Europe.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"FRANCE'S BUDGET SHOWS ECONOMY—GERMANY'S NEEDS ARE LARGE—ITALY FLOATS COMPULSORY LOAN—OTHER NEWS.

[From a compilation by the National City Bank of New York.]

"M. Klotz, French minister of finance, has introduced into the chamber a proposal for a provisional vote of credit to cover the cost of civil services for the fourth quarter of the year.

"The amount involved is 5,767,000,000 francs ($1,113,031,000), a reduction of 1,200,000,000 francs ($231,600,000), as compared with the third quarter. Military credits for the same period will amount to 2,984,000,000 francs ($575,912,000), a reduction of 842,000,000 francs ($162,506,000), on the last quarter. The reductions are principally on account of pay and maintenance of the troops and material and are due to demobilization.

"The aggregate total for the whole year asked for in votes on account under the heading of exceptional expenditure is lower by 12,597,000,000 francs ($2,431,221,000) than the figure of the votes on account of last year.

"GERMANY'S NEEDS LARGE.

"According to a memorandum issued by Herr Erzberger, Germany will require £1,200,000,000 to meet her financial needs for the year. Of this amount £500,000,000 will be for the service of the debt, which is expected to reach £10,000,000,000.

"An illustration of the rates at which loans are now being floated is given by the issue of a 4 per cent Stuttgart municipal loan for 10,000,000 marks, irredeemable before 1926, after which it is to be paid off during a period of 45 years, at 95.80 per cent. A 4 per cent communal loan for the districts of Saxony, Thuringia, and Anhalt, amounting to 50,000,000 marks, is issued at 94.50 per cent. Redemption will be by drawings, beginning in 1921, amounting to 1 per cent of the total paid.

"ITALY'S COMPULSORY LOAN.

"The progressive tax upon capital which Signor Nitti announced in his program has taken the shape of a compulsory long-dated loan at low interest. The commission for the preparation of this loan, presided over by Signor Tedesco, secretary to the treasury, has already fulfilled the preliminary work, and Italy will be the first nation in resolutely applying the tax, while a similar scheme appears to have been dismissed in France and to be in a nebulous stage in the German and Austrian countries.

"Giving to the progressive tax this appearance of a loan, the Government trusts to take away from it the character of confiscation, and to succeed in simplifying the method of assessment. In a few weeks the scheme, completed in every particular, will be presented to the cabinet. The contributions from the great fortunes amassed during the war will be collected directly as extraordinary supertaxes.

"FRENCH AFTER EXPORT BUSINESS.

"The 'Banque Nationale Francaise du Commerce Exteriour,' or French National Bank for Foreign Trade, which the Clemenceau Government is anxious to bring into a corporate existence as quickly as possible, is intended to be a semiofficial institution. As a matter of fact, the bank has already been constituted, and the bill now before the French Parliament is intended to confirm and ratify the agreement arrived at with the founders of the new bank by Messrs. Klotz, minister of finance, and Clementel, minister of commerce.

"To aid in the establishment of the bank the State will advance sums which are to be returned to the State treasury when the special reserve fund exceeds 25,000,000 francs.

"The capital of the new bank is to be 100,000,000 francs, with power to increase shortly to 200,000,000 francs. The capital has already been underwritten by syndicates of French export merchants, manufacturers, and banks.

"The State is to take 30 per cent of the net profits after the shareholders shall have received a cumulative dividend of 6 per cent. The State's profits are to be reduced to 20 per cent when the 25,000,000 francs advanced by the State shall have been repaid.

"The Government is to have a controlling voice in the management of the bank by the appointment of two official actuaries, who are to check the accounts and books and who will have the right to assist at all board meetings.

"The services the bank will render to French trade are of two kinds. In France itself the bank will mobilize all long-term credits that French export houses are obliged to grant to foreign buyers of French goods. In its foreign branches the bank's agents and correspondents will keep themselves well informed as to the commercial standing and credit of local firms. At the same time they will collect moneys and undertake the reception and dispatch of goods to or from France.

"IN FAIR WAY TO WIN.

"The plans of Premier Nitti for economic reconstruction met with universal approval in Paris, in London, and in this country, and above all, Nitti's scheme of calling in all the excessive circulation of paper currency and of reducing it to normal by means of a loan of 2½ per cent, to which every citizen would be compelled to subscribe, according to the measure of his resources, has excited the good will of all financial experts. It means nothing more nor less than a saving to the treasury of 20,000,000,000 lire, through the giving up of the fictitious value of the paper currency in Italy in order to establish a real one.

"Moreover, Premier Nitti and his equally Americanophile foreign minister, Senator Tittoni, had by means of their conciliatory manner and transparent sincerity—so different from the aggressive trickiness of Baron Sonnino—won to such an extent the sympathy, the good will, and the confidence of France, Great Britain, and above all, of the United States, that Italy was in a fair way to obtain eventual possession of Fiume, the compromise negotiated being of a nature to bring about that object."

"ENGLAND ARRANGES EXPORT CREDITS—ADVANCES UP TO 80 PER CENT OF COST OF GOODS—TO ENCOURAGE TRADE WITH NEW EUROPEAN STATES—CONDITIONS ANNOUNCED BY THE BRITISH BOARD OF TRADE.

"LONDON, September 4.

"The board of trade announce that the Government is prepared, through their export credits department, at 10 Basinghall Street, to consider applications for advances up to 80 per cent of the cost of the goods, plus freight and insurance, for goods sold to Finland, the Baltic Provinces—Latvia, Esthonia, and Lithuania—Poland, Czechoslovakia, Jugo-Slavia, and the areas in Russia to which the scheme for insurance against abnormal commercial risks applies, subject to the following conditions:

"1. Documents are to be surrendered to the buyers against their acceptance of a bill in sterling drawn by the sellers for the full amount of the invoices, together with security (see the next paragraph). The Government will release the drawers from any recourse against them for the amount of the advances made.

"2. The purchasers must agree to take up such documents against a deposit of currency calculated on the basis of the market exchanges, such deposit to be made with an approved bank in the country of purchase and to be held as security for the due payment of the bills.

"3. When the advance is needed, the relative documents will have to be accompanied by a letter of guaranty from an approved bank of the country of purchase stating that the documents will be promptly taken up against such deposit of currency and undertaking that the amount of such currency shall always be maintained at a figure sufficient to give a margin of 15 per cent over the value of sterling as based upon the exchanges (not upon the official exchanges, if any). All applications accompanied by a banker's guaranty of sterling payment at maturity of the bill will receive preferential consideration.

"4. * * * of the advance made to the cost (plus proposals for a deposit of produce or securties instead of currency).

"5. The advances made by the department will be a first charge upon the proceeds of the bills and securities, but if such proceeds are less than the cost, plus freight and insurance, the loss represented by the difference will be divided between the department and the drawer of the bill in the proportion of the advance made to the cost (plus freight and insurance).

"6. The credits are to outstand only for such periods as the department may determine in each case at the time of application for the advances.

"7. The Government will settle from time to time the countries and goods to which the scheme relates, but advances will not be made for the export of raw materials and preference will be given to the finance of goods where the larger part of the cost is due to manufacture in this country.

"8. All applications must be passed to the department by the bankers of the sellers, whose recommendation must be attached.

"9. After satisfaction of the advance the bill and securities will be handed to the seller if payment of the full amount of the bill has not been made.

"10. At any time after maturity of the bill or after any default the department will be entitled to close a transaction and hand over the security held, the seller bearing his proportion, as indicated above, of any loss incurred.

"11. The conditions set out above may be modified at any time or in special cases.

"With the consent of Barclays Bank (Ltd.), L. A. Davis, deputy foreign manager of that bank, has been appointed manager of the department."

OIL CONTROL AND BRITISH INTERESTS.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the New York Times of yesterday on the control of oil passing into the hands of Great Britain. It is a matter to which I have called the attention of the Senate heretofore and which I think is of great importance.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 21, 1919.]

"SEES OIL CONTROL PASSING TO BRITAIN—AMERICA ALREADY IMPORTING PETROLEUM, SAYS E. MACKAY EDGAR—FOREIGN FIELDS GOBBLED—IN 10 YEARS AMERICAN IMPORTS, HE PREDICTS, WILL BE RESTORING STERLING EQUILIBRIUM.

"LONDON, September 20.

"Recently E. Mackay Edgar, head of the firm of Sperling & Co., expressed confident views on the ability of Great Britain to hold her own against American competition in an article in Sperling's Journal entitled 'The answer to Mr. Vanderlip.' In a further article in the same journal Mr. Edgar makes an equally optimistic deliverance on the future of the world's supply of petroleum, which he is convinced lies in British and not American hands at present. Mr. Edgar says it seems impossible to overthrow America's predominance in the oil industry, but just as America, although 30 or 40 years ago the great timber-producing country, is now in the grip of a timber famine, so he is convinced, first, that she is rapidly running through her stores of domestic oil and is obliged to look abroad for future reserves, and, secondly, that these reserves are owned or controlled by British capital.

"'More oil,' says Mr. Edgar, 'has probably run to waste in the United States than has ever reached the refiners. Improvidence, carelessness, a blind gambling spirit have marked all except the most recent phases of the industry. The great oil fields of the United States are nearing exhaustion, and it is not believed that the new ones which are being proved will yield anything like the old prodigal production. America has recklessly and in 60 years run through a legacy that, properly conserved, should have lasted her for at least a century and a half.

"'Already, although few people realize it, America is an importer of oil. Last year she imported from Mexico 38,000,000 barrels of 42 gallons each. Like farsighted men, however, Americans are now diligently scouring the world for new oil fields, only to find that wherever they turn British enterprise has been before them.'

"Mr. Edgar goes on to say that one finds that Americans have had comparatively little success in securing oil leases in Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, Colombia, Venezuela, and Ecuador, and that a decisive and really overwhelming majority of petroleum concessions in these countries is held by British subjects. Geologists are convinced that a continuous belt of oil runs from Mexico through the Isthmus and bifurcated into Venezuela and Ecuador. 'By far the most valuable concessions in these territories belong to the Alves group,' he adds. And Alves is a wholly British group. Then, again, 'that greatest of all organizations,' the Shell group, operating with a paid-up capital which Edgar estimates at £100,000,000, possesses exclusive or controlling interests in every important oil field in the world—in Mexico, Russia, the Dutch East Indies, Roumania, Egypt, Venezuela, Trinidad, India, Ceylon, Malay States, North and South China, Siam, the Straits Settlements, and the Philippines. In a few years, Edgar declares, it will control not far short of one-fourth of the world's supply.

"'We hold in our hands, then,' says Edgar, 'secure control of the future of the world's oil supply. We are sitting tight on what must soon become the lion's share of raw material indispensable to every manufacturing country and unobtainable in sufficient quantities outside the sphere of British influence.

"'I estimate that if their present curve of consumption, especially of high-grade products, is maintained, Americans in 10 years' time will be importing 500,000,000 barrels of oil yearly. At £2 a barrel, that means an annual payment of £200,000,000 per annum, most, if not all, of which will find its way into British pockets.'"

FREEDOM OF SPEECH IN WAR TIME (S. DOC. NO. 95).

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have here an article which appeared in the Harvard Law Journal, written by Zechariah Chaffee, jr., of the Harvard Law School. It is upon the freedom of speech in war time, and, so far as my observation goes, it is altogether the most comprehensive discussion of that subject which has yet appeared. I ask to have it printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2972) to extend the cancellation stamp privilege to the Roosevelt Memorial Association, which were, after the word "employment," in lines 4 and 5, to strike out the remainder of line 5 and all of lines 6 and 7, and insert "of special canceling stamps bearing the following words and figures: 'Roosevelt Memorial Association, October 20–27,' at such post offices as he may designate and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe," and to amend the title so as to read: "An act to extend the cancellation stamp privilege for the Roosevelt Memorial Association."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 9205. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I rose to ask that the Chair lay before the Senate the resolution introduced by me on last Friday, which went over under the rule, but I am just reminded that under the rule of the Senate on Monday the calendar should be called. I do not wish to interfere with that. I can just as well call up the resolution to which I have referred tomorrow or at the conclusion of the calendar, if it should be concluded before 2 o'clock.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the calendar is very small at present, and I ask unanimous consent that the rule be dispensed with this morning in order that the Senator may present his resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no desire to do that. I would just as lief take up the resolution to-morrow morning or the next day. I do not like to interfere with the call of the calendar. There are Senators here having bills on the calendar which they desire to have taken up.

Mr. THOMAS. I withdraw the request.

Mr. McLEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 126, being House bill 7478. This is the bill that has been under discussion in the Senate for a week or 10 days, and I think it ought to be disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest that that would be out of order unless by unanimous consent the call of the calendar is first dispensed with.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator that the calendar be called, and when the bill referred to is reached on the calendar it can be taken up in its regular order. I do not like to dispense with the call of the calendar.

Mr. McLEAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

The resolution (S. Res. 76) defining a peace treaty which shall assure to the people of the United States the attainment of the ends for which they entered the war, and declaring the policy of our Government to meet fully obligations to ourselves and to the world, was announced as first in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 529) for the relief of the heirs of Adam and Noah Brown was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

HEIRS OF SUSAN A. NICHOLAS.

The bill (S. 600) for the relief of the heirs of Mrs. Susan A. Nicholas was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask the Senator to withdraw his objection for just a moment to allow me to make a very brief explanation of the bill. It is a bill which has been before Congress for a long time and is for the relief of two old ladies. One of them, Mrs. Caroline Nicholas Muller, is 75 years of age. Their father was a United States Senator from the State of Louisiana. He died in 1857. The facts are that this property was taken by the Union Army. It was composed of sugar, molasses, mules, sugar cane, and things of that kind. It was valued at $50,000 and the committee found that the claimants were entitled to $40,000. A large crop of growing sugar was also destroyed, but no account is taken of that, because the Army got no benefit of the growing crops. The Army did get the benefit of the sugar and molasses and other property.

These old ladies are now in a distressed financial condition. One of them has to work hard for a living, although she is 75 years of age. There have been no laches in this case. These ladies have been trying for 18 or 20 years, according to the record here—and I do not know what efforts they made before that—to get their claim adjusted. It is certainly a just and equitable one. I have tried for two or three Congresses to get it through. I sincerely hope the Senator will not press his objection, and will allow this case to proceed.

Mr. PENROSE. What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. RANSDELL. The amount found by the committee is $40,000. The evidence shows that the value of the property was $50,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, claims of this kind have been presented to the Senate time and time again, ever since the close of the Civil War. Of late years none of them have passed the Senate. Omnibus claim bills have passed the Senate under rules adopted by both Houses of Congress, but not claims of this character.

The items on which the claim is based are as follows:

500 hogsheads sugar (1,120 pounds per hogshead), at 6 cents per pound	$33,600
500 barrels molasses, at 25 cents per gallon	5,000
43 sugar mules, at $200 per mule	8,600
14 sugar-cane wagons, at $150 each	2,100
5 bagasse carts, at $75 each	375
43 sets harness, at $10 per set	430

It is true that this is not quite as bad as some of the claims that have been made, such as 648 fence poles, 432 pounds of tobacco, and items given in detail, such as 3,000 bushels of wheat growing in the field at such and such a price per bushel, and so many pounds of cotton destroyed while in the field and worth so much.

I have taken great pains in the past to go into the testimony in cases of this kind, and in certain cases I have found that the number of pounds of tobacco or the number of fence poles that have been destroyed by the Federal armies were sworn and testified to by people who were not over 9 years old at the time the destruction of the property took place.

If these bills are going to pass, the proper way for them to be handled is by an omnibus bill, and have all of them come in under one head; not to pick out one as against another. If the Committee on Claims decides that these claims should be paid—claims for which I believe there is very little basis—let them all be paid. Similar claims have been sent to the Court of Claims. I can not say whether this has or not, but——

Mr. RANSDELL. I will state to the Senator that this particular one has not.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not say that it has. As I just stated before the Senator interrupted me, I do not know whether it has been sent to the Court of Claims or not, but let it go there before we undertake to pay it. Let the claimants present what testimony they have to that court, whether there is anybody——

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. SMOOT. Wait just a moment, and I will conclude.

Mr. RANSDELL. Has the Court of Claims jurisdiction now to act upon this matter? We removed that jurisdiction several years ago.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; we removed the jurisdiction, but removing it does not prevent the Congress of the United States from asking that court to consider cases of this kind. Let the court be shown the facts by the testimony of the witnesses who know that there were 500 hogheads of sugar, who know whether there were 5 carts or 43 sets of harness or 43 sugar mules. It seems to me that that is the least that could possibly be asked on the part of the claimants—that they should establish their case, and not bring a claim of this character before the Senate and ask the Senate to pass it.

I recognize what the Senator says—that the father of one of these claimants was a Member of this body.

Mr. RANSDELL. The father of both of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, that does not make any difference. I would not care whether it was the humblest citizen living in Louisiana or any other State in the Union. Their claim against the Government is just as strong as the claim of the daughter of any Senator that ever lived. Let us try these cases in a uniform way, and let us have some evidence, at least, that the Government of the United States is a debtor, and that these people who are making this claim were loyal to the Government of the United States.

For that reason I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah objects, and the bill will be passed over.

MOSES M. BANE.

The bill (S. 1479) for the relief of the estate of Moses M. Bane was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the estate of Moses M. Bane, deceased, who was receiver of public moneys for the Territory of Utah, and paid office rent at Salt Lake City for the years 1877 and 1878 and for the first quarter of the year 1879, the sum of $1,080, the said sum for office rent having been advanced by the officer out of his private means.

Mr. PHELAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Utah if he approves of this measure?

Mr. SMOOT. The department approves of it, as I understand. I did not introduce the bill. The lady is living in Virginia to-day. I understand that while she was the wife of Col. Bane, he, as an official of the Land Department, during the years stated here, did pay that rent, and that the Government owes him $1,080. I have not any interest whatever in it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1223) for the relief of the owner of the steamer Mayflower and for the relief of passengers on board said steamer was announced as next in order.

Mr. LENROOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 174) for the relief of Emma H. Ridley was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ARREARS OF PAY, BOUNTY, AND OTHER ALLOWANCES.

The bill (S. 631) repealing certain provisions contained in the urgent deficiency act approved December 22, 1911, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following provisions contained in the urgent deficiency act approved December 22, 1911, to wit: "No claim for arrears of pay, bounty, or other allowances growing out of the service of volunteers who served in the Army of the United States during the Civil War shall be received or considered by the accounting officers of the Treasury unless filed in the office of the Auditor for the War Department on or before December 31, 1912"; "No claim for arrears of pay, bounty, or other allowances growing out of the service of volunteers who served in the Army of the United States during the War with Spain shall be received or considered by the accounting officers of the Treasury unless filed in the office of the Auditor for the War Department on or before December 31, 1914," relating to claims for arrears of pay, bounty, or other allowances growing out of the Civil War and the War with Spain are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That hereafter no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim for pay, bounty, or other allowances shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, or receive for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than 20 per cent of the amount allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the said accounting officers; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall demand, collect, or receive from the claimant the whole or any part of a claim allowed such claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500.

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF CHARLES BACKMAN.

The bill (S. 1722) for the relief of Watson B. Dickerman, administrator of the estate of Charles Backman, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, is not that a very old claim, dating back to 1868?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is my recollection that the claim has been pending for several years. There is not the slightest doubt but that the Government of the United States owes this estate the money.

Mr. PHELAN. It strikes me as very remarkable, when the Government of the United States destroys property of people in 1919 not only in my State, but in the Senator's State, that we should be compensating them in matters of loss by reason of a waste of liquor in 1868. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

LIEUT. EDWARD S. FARROW.

The bill (S. 2259) for the relief of Edward S. Farrow was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the laws regulating appointments in the Army be, and they are hereby, suspended only for the purpose of this act. And the President is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the consent of the Senate, appoint Edward S. Farrow, late first lieutenant, Twenty-first Regiment United States Infantry, a first lieutenant of Infantry in the Army of the United States, and thereupon place him, the said Edward S. Farrow, upon the retired list of the Army, with the rank, grade, pay, and allowances of first lieutenant, without regard to the number now authorized by law of said retired list.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1369) to regulate the height, area, and use of buildings in the District of Columbia and to create a zoning commission, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PHELAN. In the absence of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] I ask that the bill may go over, as the District Committee is now formulating some amendments to the act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 168) to create a commission to investigate and report to Congress a plan on the questions involved in the financing of house construction and home ownership and Federal aid therefor was announced as next in order.

Mr. PENROSE. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2224) to incorporate the Recreation Association of America was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

DIVISION OF TUBERCULOSIS.

The bill (S. 1660) to provide a division of tuberculosis in, and an advisory council for, the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PENROSE. Let that go over, Mr. President.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit me to make a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I object to the consideration of the bill at this time. If the Senate gives unanimous consent to the Senator from Louisiana to make an explanation, of course I shall not object.

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. PENROSE. I said I object to the consideration of the bill, but I shall not object to the Senator's speaking as long as he chooses if the Senate gives unanimous consent.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I would like to make a brief explanation of the bill. I doubt if the Senator from Pennsylvania understands it. It is a bill to create a division of tuberculosis in the Public Health Service. It was objected to when it came up last, I think by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], on the ground that it would cost a very large sum. I have a very brief memorandum here from the head of the Public Health Service, which I would like to read in explanation of the bill.

We all know that tuberculosis is a disease which causes more loss of human life than any other disease. It is very destructive of human life, and this year, with the influenza threatening us, we certainly ought to do everything possible to guard against this disease, so close kin in its disastrous effects to influenza. This memorandum, addressed to me, is dated August 20 and reads as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
Washington, August 20, 1919.

Memorandum for Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL.

It appears from the discussion on August 18, 1919, by the Senate of the bill (S. 1660) to provide a division of tuberculosis in the Public Health Service that there was no difference of opinion as to the necessity of the Public Health Service having appropriations for the study and control of tuberculosis, but there does seem to be a difference of opinion as to the administration of such a fund.

The necessity for the Federal Government bearing its just proportion of the work of the control of tuberculosis is set forth in the report of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, under date of January 18, 1919. I do not feel that it is necessary to make any supplemental statement in this regard.

I should like to say that the report which is attached to the bill shows that last year we lost approximately 145,000 people from tuberculosis, and that it was unquestionably the most fruitful cause of death in this country.

The memorandum continues:

There seems to be no opposition to the Federal Government undertaking its share of the work, but there does seem to be some opposition to the creation of an administrative division to carry on this work. Whether such administrative division is created or not, it is obvious that additional appropriations would require some additional administrative personnel, but the amount expended for administrative personnel would be a negligible part in the expenditure of funds appropriated for the investigation of tuberculosis. Administrative personnel would not be in the nature of large increases as has been forecasted, but would be somewhat along the lines that you have indicated, i. e., the detail of an additional medical officer to the bureau to take charge of the division, and the employment of some additional office personnel which probably would not exceed six or eight assistants and clerks. It has always been the policy of this bureau to decentralize so far as possible its work, and I believe that investigation will show that it conducts its activities with a smaller overhead charge for administration than any other bureau in the Federal Government.

Mr. PENROSE. The great building would come later on.

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator wants to take the responsibility of preventing Congress from doing all in its power to eradicate tuberculosis, and check, as much as is humanly possible, the greatest enemy of the human race, I am willing that he should take that responsibility. For my part I am going to lay this matter before the Senate, and let it decide whether it wants to pass the bill. My State does not feel any special interest in the establishment of this division. We care very little about it down there. We have our share of tuberculosis, but this is a matter that relates to the whole Union. I want to have it done for the benefit of humanity in the United States, and even if it does cost a considerable amount of money, the Congress that has been pouring out money as we have been pouring it out here for the last two years certainly ought not to balk, Mr. President and Senators, at a reasonable appropriation to control this awful curse.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to proceed so that I may finish reading this memorandum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. RANSDELL. The memorandum continues:

As to the statement that the creation of such a division would require a great building rented in the District of Columbia, I beg to assure you that there is no such intention on the part of this bureau, but a very large proportion of the sums appropriated for tuberculosis work would be expended in field investigations and demonstrations. All that would probably be necessary to house such a division in the District of Columbia would be the provision of four or five office rooms for administrative purposes and for the storing of records and correspondence. It is believed that the Treasury Department would be able to provide this space in buildings already under the control of that department.

I am glad to note in the RECORD that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has made the following statement:

"I have no objection to the Government making appropriations for the purpose of assisting in the investigation of tuberculosis. The Senator from Louisiana is no more interested in the subject than I am. The Senator from Louisiana does not know of its ravages and what it has done to the people of the United States more than I know it."

With the above explanation that only a relatively small office force will be involved in the creation of a new division in the bureau, taken in connection with the attitude, as indicated in the above quotation of the Senator, it is hoped that the Senator will withdraw his opposition and consent to the consideration of this bill, the enactment of which is urgently needed in order that the Federal Government may properly discharge its responsibilities to the Nation and the people.

J. C. PERRY,
Acting Surgeon General.

Just one word, Mr. President, and I shall have no more to say. I have tried for several years to get this bill passed. The Surgeon General of the Public Health Service insists that it is essential to the proper carrying on of this work. If Senators wish to object to its passage, they can take that responsibility. It is for them to decide, and not for me. I firmly believe, sir, that it ought to be passed. I firmly believe that it will do a great deal to check tuberculosis, in conjunction with the efforts of the respective States, and I sincerely hope, in behalf of the poor human beings who have suffered so much from this awful disease and those who may hereafter fall victims to it, that Congress will do what it can to check it. It will be a very small sum, and I earnestly hope that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] will not insist on objecting to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word in answer to the Senator from Louisana. I object to this bill because it establishes another division, and not only a division within the Public Health Service—because that is not all it does—but a division and an advisory council for the United States Public Health Service. I have not any doubt but that the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana that they will begin with about five or six or seven officials is correct. But, Senators, how often have we heard stated upon the floor of the Senate that if we create this bureau, or create that division, at no time in the future will the expense of same be more than $10,000. I call to mind now the establishment of a division in the Department of Labor. The Senators who were in favor of it, and asking the Senators to adopt the measure, guaranteed to the Senate that at no future time would the expense of that division exceed $25,000. I venture to say, Mr. President, that last year there was appropriated nearly $300,000 for that division alone.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if there is any probability of the Senators who guaranteed against more than $25.000 being willing to make their guaranty good?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever, Mr. President; and it has happened so often before that when the statement was made I had very little confidence in it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I would like to know some reason why they want a division. The department makes an estimate to the Appropriations Committee, as the Senator, being on the committee, well knows, of the amount it thinks necessary to carry on its work in the country. That is done through the head of the medical department, and we always give them the money they ask for. I want to know some reason why they want another division when they are doing the work now.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have confidence enough in the United States Public Health Service to believe that if an appropriation is made for this specific activity in that service they can carry it on with the officials who are now in charge of the service. I say now that as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I will favor an appropriation for this specific work, but I want the money that is appropriated for it to go directly to the work in the field and not for the building up in the District of Columbia of another division occupying rooms that could well be occupied by other activities of the Government and for which the Government is paying rent, and high rent at that, in some cases as high as $1.75 a square foot, whereas before the war we thought that 33⅓ cents per square foot was an exceedingly high price. No one can tell me that this division, if created, is not going to grow in numbers and expand until there would be a building used entirely for its purposes. I speak that way, Mr. President, because all of the past experiences in the establishment of bureaus and divisions for the Government since I have been a Member of this body prove that to be the case.

I want officials of the United States Public Health Service to know that I am perfectly willing, and I say now that I believe that every member of the Appropriations Committee is perfectly willing, to give them money for this very purpose. It is a laudable purpose. It is a work that ought to be done by the Government of the United States, but let it be done under the present organization, and I am quite sure that it will be done just as successfully as if we created the new division. I know that it will save the United States hundreds of—I was going to say hundreds of thousands, which it would have in time, but it will save tens of thousands of dollars in the very near future to the Government of the United States by not creating this division.

I think the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] will bear me out in stating that no division of the Government has been so liberally cared for with appropriations as the United States Public Health Service. I can not call to mind now one request within reason that has been made by them that has not been granted by your Committee on Appropriations. So far as I am concerned, it is not that I am opposed to a division in the Public Health Service only but I am opposed to the creation of any more bureaus or any more divisions in the departments of our Government. For that reason when the bill comes up I shall vote against it, and, of course, I want the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] to know that it is not because I have any special objection to this division more than I would have to any division in any department that may be suggested in the future.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to announce that no motion has been made to continue consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It was understood that we were talking by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANSDELL. Do I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania insists upon his objection?

Mr. PENROSE. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

The bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McLEAN rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the bill has been read in full and that an amendment is now pending.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] allow it to go over until we can get through with the calendar? We can then take it up.

Mr. McLEAN. If there can be an understanding that after matters are objected to they will be passed over and this bill will be taken up, that will be satisfactory. If, however, there is to be a discussion of 10 minutes on every calendar number, the morning hour will soon be consumed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I do not know of another number on the calendar that is going to lead to any discussion.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator know of any matter yet to be reached that is pressing for action?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say that there is.

Mr. McLEAN. Then I think we might as well go ahead with this bill.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, a motion would be in order to proceed with the bill now, but if the Senator from Connecticut prefers to wait and make the motion when the calendar is concluded, that course will perhaps be better. Under the rule a motion is in order now to proceed to the consideration of the bill, but I will not make it, and I suppose the Senator will not make it at this time.

Mr. McLEAN. It is in order, but I do not think we will gain anything in time by making the motion now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the calendar will be announced.

Mr. POMERENE subsequently said: Mr. President, I simply wish to ask permission to offer an amendment to the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, which is on the calendar, so that Senators may be advised of it.

On page 2, line 22, of the bill, after the word "section," I desire to offer the amendment which I just sent to the desk, and which I ask to have printed in the RECORD; and also another amendment on page 3, line 9, to strike out the numerals "25" and insert "20."

The first amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. POMERENE is as follows:

On page 2, line 22, after the word "section," insert:
"The total liabilities to any association of any person, corporation, company, or firm, upon the discount of bills of exchange, drafts, demand obligations and commercial or business paper, as described in (1) and (2) hereof, shall not exceed at any time twice the paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus of said association."

EDWARD W. WHITAKER.

The bill (S. 861) for the relief of Edward W. Whitaker was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments on page 2, line 2, after the words "United States," to strike out "after the date of the passage of this act" and insert "thereafter"; in line 5, after the word "the," to strike out "passage of this act" and insert "date of his commission as a retired officer"; and in line 7, after the word "act," to insert "Provided further, That no back pay, allowances, or other emoluments, except his pay as a retired lieutenant colonel of cavalry, shall accrue as a result of the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Edward W. Whitaker, late lieutenant colonel First Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Cavalry, and brevet brigadier general, United States Volunteers, a lieutenant colonel of Cavalry in the Army of the United States; and when so appointed he shall be placed upon the retired list of the Army, unlimited, with the pay and emoluments of a retired officer of that grade the retired list being thereby increased in number to that extent: Provided, That on receiving the said retired pay under this act he shall relinquish all his right and claim to pension from the United States thereafter, and any payment made to him covering a period subsequent to the date of his commission as a retired officer shall be deducted from the amount due him on the first payment under this act: Provided further, That no back pay, allowances, or other emoluments, except his pay as a retired lieutenant colonel of Cavalry, shall accrue as a result of the passage of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE DIXIE HIGHWAY.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) exempting the Dixie Highway from the prohibition contained in the act approved July 11, 1919, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, line 4, after the words "Dixie Highway," to strike out "around" and insert "on," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the completion of the construction of the detour in the Dixie Highway on the reservation at Camp Knox, Ky., out of unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the support and maintenance of the Army or the Military Establishment be, and the same is hereby, exempted from the prohibition contained in the above-quoted provision of said act, and the War Department is hereby authorized to proceed to complete such construction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in the second whereas, after the word "detour," to strike out the word "around" and insert the word "on," so as to make the preamble read:

Whereas by an act approved July 11, 1919 (Public No. 7, 66th Cong., H. R. 5227), it is provided as follows:
"That no part of any of the appropriations made herein nor any of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the support and maintenance of the Army or the Military Establishment shall be expended for the purchase of real estate of (or) for the construction of Army camps or cantonments except in such cases at National Army or National Guard camps or cantonments which were in use prior to November 11, 1918, where it has been or may be found more economical to the Government for the purpose of salvaging such camps or cantonments to buy real estate than to continue to pay rentals or claims for damages thereon, and except where industrial plants have been constructed or taken over by the Government for war purposes and the purchase of land is necessary in order to protect the interest of the Government"; and
Whereas under the terms of the said provision of said act, construction at Camp Knox, Ky., is prohibited, and among the items of construction being done at Camp Knox upon the date of the approval of said act was the construction of a portion of the Dixie Highway, made necessary by the discontinuance of the use of about 10 miles of said Dixie Highway through the reservation at Camp Knox, and the construction of a detour on the reservation to replace the broken link in the Dixie Highway; and
Whereas such detour is an essential part of the highway system of the State of Kentucky and its completion is in the national interest: Therefore be it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

PANAMA CANAL ZONE.

The bill (S. 1273) to prohibit intoxicating liquors and prostitution within the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

PAYMENTS TO DEPENDENTS OF DECEASED SOLDIERS.

The bill (S. 2497) to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relative of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], before taking up the consideration of the bill, to explain the details of it, because I have not had time to read the report. On its face it seems to me the whole subject really is before the Finance Committee, and that they have dozens of bills with reference to the war-risk insurance affecting our soldiers. Will the Senator please explain it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not aware, of course, of the bills which are before the Committee on Finance, but this bill has one specific object in view. It is to restore the provision of the law affecting the Regular Army up to the time of the enactment of the war-risk insurance law. Through an obvious error, the war-risk insurance act, by implication at least, repealed the provision of the law which had been upon the statute books for many years, under which the nearest of kin, in the event of the death of an officer or soldier in the Regular Army, received six months' pay in the nature of an insurance payment to tide over the emergency caused by the death of the head of the family. It is a privilege which Regular Army Officers' families and Regular soldiers 'families have had for many, many years.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if it is not true that they would also receive the insurance which the officers and men were carrying? Would not the dependent also receive the payment of $57.50 each month as provided for under the war-risk insurance act?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator will find the following language in section 3 of the bill:

SEC. 3. That the sum received hereunder shall be deducted from any amount that may be, or may become, due and payable to any such widow, child, children, or dependent relative of such officer or enlisted man under the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, or any act or acts amendatory thereof.

So the Senator will see that we have taken care of the particular matter to which he alludes.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the object of the bill is simply to authorize the Government to pay six months' pay immediately, so that the beneficiaries may have the use of the money at once?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having heretofore been read, it is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. If there be no amendment proposed to the bill, it will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House on the amendments of the Senate to H. R. 8624, the food-control bill, which have been returned disagreed to by the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GRONNA. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota whether he would have any objection to placing on the conference committee some member of the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that I would have objection, because the bill is under the jurisdiction and in the control of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know; but the principal amendment is an amendment coming from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me say to the Senator that the amendment was written into the bill by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and it was amended by the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know there was a provision put in it by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. If the Senator objects, I will not press the suggestion.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; in the absence of a more potent and just suggestion, I do object.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think, really, that the District Committee ought to be represented in the conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. GRONNA, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was announced as next in order.

The joint resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Article V of the Constitution of the United States is hereby amended to read as follows, to wit:

"Article V.

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution when ratified within six years from the date of their proposal by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, or by the electors in three-fourths thereof, as the mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief observation on the joint resolution which has just been read. I am very much in favor of the joint resolution, but it is obvious that it can not be disposed of under the five-minute rule. I wish, however, again to urge the early adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which will provide that no amendment shall become a part of the Constitution unless it is ratified by the voters at the polls, each State voting separately.

The reasons which brought about the amendment to the Constitution providing for the direct election of Senators applies with equal force, even with greater force, to the suggestion that a constitutional amendment should not be adopted except by a vote of the people. I believe that the two amendments which were last proposed for ratification, viz, the one providing for woman suffrage and the other for prohibition—and I am earnestly in favor of both those amendments—were not forced upon the people, but that they were submitted in response to a demand made by the people. At the same time I am not oblivious to the fact that there are millions of citizens of high character who believe that lobbies intimidated the legislatures of the various States and even intimidated Congress into submitting those amendments. I do not believe that; I believe, as I have stated, that those amendments were in response to a demand of the people, and that they would be sustained by the people at the polls by a two-thirds majority; yet I feel that it is clearly our duty, in this day of progress, when we are forward looking, to say to the people, "On this grave question of your fundamental law you, the people, should have a right to say what sort of a Constitution you desire to live under."

Mr. POMERENE rose.

Mr. ASHURST. I have only five minutes, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I merely want to ask the Senator a question. This is a very interesting question.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. In some of the States where they have the referendum it is contended that there may be a referendum on the resolution of the general assembly ratifying an amendment to the Constitution. What is the Senator's view as to whether or not that is correct?

Mr. ASHURST. I have heretofore gone into that. While it is true that in States which have the referendum we treat the people as a part of the law-making body, yet I am convinced that when the framers of the Federal Constitution used the word "legislatures" they did not intend that the people should be included in the expression; in other words, I believe that when the Constitution was framed it was the intention of its framers that the legislatures of the States and not the people should ratify the various proposed amendments, unless ratification was brought about by a convention. Notwithstanding the fact that some courts have held that the referendum if resulting unfavorably to a proposed constitutional amendment is binding, I dissent from such view.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will permit me, I might say that some months ago I introduced and had referred to the Committee on the Judiciary a resolution carrying out that idea, and I showed it to the Senator before it was introduced. I hope that the Committee on the Judiciary will before long give a hearing on the resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me say to the Senator from Mississippi in reference to his resolution—and he did me the honor of asking me to read it before he introduced it, and I remember the language of his resolution—that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary at the last Congress had before it a joint resolution proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and, having therefore considered that particular joint resolution, reported it favorably; but the fact that they have not reported the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut is in no sense a derogation of the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. President, under the limitations of the five-minute rule one can not discuss this question, and I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that I may be allowed to proceed four minutes longer on this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

Mr. ASHURST. The joint resolution before me provides that hereafter—and it is not retroactive in any sense—all proposed amendments to the Constitution submitted by Congress shall be adopted within six years. The joint resolution simply changes Article V of the Federal Constitution in this regard. Article V provides that the Constitution may be amended after the proposed amendment has been adopted by a two-thirds vote in each House of the Congress and when the legislatures of three-fourths of the States have adopted it or by conventions duly called in three-fourths of the States.

The joint resolution now pending proposing to amend the Constitution simply sets up an additional tribunal. It does not take away the two tribunals or two methods of amending the Constitution that now exist; it simply gives the Congress, the National Legislature, the right, the power, and the authority to submit amendments to a vote of the people if Congress shall see fit.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Has the court of any State in which a referendum is a part of the State law held that such a referendum would not lie to a proposed amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. ASHURST. No; on the contrary, one court of high authority has held—I think a district court in a State which has a referendum—that notwithstanding the fact that the legislature had ratified the proposed constitutional amendment, if at a referendum the people disapprove the ratification of the legislature, the ratification is null and void. It is a respectable court, a court of high authority.

In addition to the fact that a further tribunal is set up by which the people may affirmatively pass on proposed amendments to the Constitution, there is another vital part of the joint resolution, to wit, the proposed amendment must be ratified within six years. The necessity for such a provision must be obvious when we reflect there are now pending two amendments which have been pending since the 15th of September, 1789, over 130 years; that there is another amendment submitted in 1810 which provides that no citizen of the United States shall accept any gift or anything of value or reward or title from any prince or foreign State. That proposed amendment was submitted 109 years ago and is still pending. It once lacked but one vote of being ratified. I am sure that such an amendment would meet the approbation of nine-tenths of the American people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, this joint resolution was reported favorably by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary at the last session, but, owing to the stress of business, it was not reached upon the calendar at that session. It was discussed at times briefly but not at all exhaustively; indeed, it would not seem that a very exhaustive discussion of the joint resolution were necessary. It was unanimously reported by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary both at the last session and at this session. I am not sure that every member of the committee was in attendance when it was reported, but there were no adverse votes, and there was no minority report.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has made a much more thorough study of the considerations pertaining to the necessity of this proposed amendment to the Constitution than have I, and I do not intend in any profound way to elucidate the resolution or to enter upon a discussion of the considerations that make it necessary. I think we are more or less familiar with them.

In brief, the reasons which I think and which the committee think make this proposed amendment to the Constitution proper and wise are these: As the Senator from Arizona has stated, the Constitution, in Article V, provides in substance that amendments to the Constitution of the United States may be made when proposed by two-thirds of each branch of Congress and ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States or by conventions called in three-fourths of the States for that purpose.

In the whole history of the amendment of the Constitution since its existence, Congress has never availed itself of the second method of ratification; that is, it has never recommended that an amendment be ratified by conventions in the several States; but it has always, without exception, recommended that the other method proposed in the Constitution for ratification should be adopted, to wit, ratification by the legislatures of the several States.

In passing, I may say in relation to the inquiry interjected by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] as to whether, in such States as under their constitutions have to have their legislative proposals submitted to the people by what is known as the process of referendum for their approval before they can become valid, the constitutional language of submitting the proposed amendment of the United States Constitution to the legislatures of the several States compels its submission to the people of those States—I do not know that that question has been finally and definitely adjudicated in this country. I do not know whether it has been before the Supreme Court or not. There have been some decisions of inferior courts, one of which I seem to recall, that where the constitution of a State made a referendum to the people necessary for the validity of an act of the legislature, such referendum became a part of the legislative process, a part of legislation, and that the action of the people by referendum was really a part of the legislature of that State. I never have been able to persuade myself, though I have not given the subject very careful consideration, that that contention was well founded, because I think the ordinary rules applying to the construction of legal documents would require that the term "legislatures," as used in the Constitution of the United States, should be construed in the light of what the framers of that instrument at the time considered to be legislatures. At the time our Constitution was formed the referendum process had not entered into the public policies of any of the States, and "legislatures" then certainly meant to the framers of the Constitution the general assemblies of the States, as distinguished from the electors thereof.

I am going to ask, as my time is about to expire, that I may proceed and conclude my remarks on this question. The matter has been up several times, and I have always been willing to pass it over, but I should like to make a statement on it this morning, if there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before the Senator goes to another branch of the subject, the Senator has referred to a decision of one of the lower State courts. I am familiar with that. Has this matter been before any Federal court, so far as the Senator knows?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know, Mr. President. I will frankly state that I have not attempted to investigate that question. Whether it had or not, I should think that unless it had gone at least to a very high Federal court the decision would not be considered as final and conclusive until it was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, since it is such a grave constitutional question.

The amendment proposes, in addition to the two methods now provided by the Constitution for the ratification of amendments, to add a third method, to wit, ratification by the electors of the States. It also proposes to fix a time limit, to wit, a period of six years, within which such amendments must be ratified in order to become valid.

It has been suggested that there had been no great abuse, in the history of the Government in the past, in the present method of ratification, and hence that this joint resolution is not very necessary. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary to wait for abuses to arise. In view of the tendency in this country to make the people more and more interested in and responsible for the functions of government, I think it is an exceedingly wise provision that our fundamental law should not be changed except by direct participation of the people themselves. If the people are competent, as they are, to elect their representatives in this body, and if the former exclusive privilege of the legislatures in that respect was taken away from the legislatures and placed directly in the hands of the people, it would seem that the approval of a constitutional amendment could be justified by the same logic and the same reasoning which proved so efficacious to bring about the change as to the election of United States Senators.

Furthermore, if the process of amending the Constitution in the past has not been abused, it was largely due, in my opinion, to the fact that in prior years the Congress of the United States confined itself to such amendments of the Constitution as concerned our form of government and the distribution of its powers. Now that there are so many movements in the country to change the Constitution in reference to matters which intimately concern themselves and are irrevocably connected with the daily habits of each individual citizen, it seems to me that all the more, in justice and in fair play and in order to determine the accurate sentiment of the people, the people themselves should be the tribunal to whom should be proposed the question of whether or not they approve a proposed change in the Constitution.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has suggested that he would like to have it arranged so that it would be necessary for the people to approve such a proposed change in the Constitution. I, for my part, have no objection whatever to such an amendment being proposed, and in fact it meets my personal and individual views.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has correctly stated my view, that I would be glad, indeed, to see an amendment adopted even to this joint resolution which will let the people be the only and the exclusive tribunal to which the same should be or could be submitted, yet there are some practical difficulties in the way. It is a difficult thing to amend the Federal Constitution; and I am comforted by the reflection, and will be content to stand on it without proposing any amendment, that if the Senator's amendment should be proposed—and I believe it will be adopted if proposed—Congress would thereafter always avail itself of that just and proper tribunal, the people themselves. So I shall not offer any amendment, because I believe the philosophy of the situation would be that Congress itself would always submit the amendment to the proper tribunal, the people.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator is correct about that; and the reason why in drafting this proposed amendment I left in the existing methods of ratification was because I think it is wiser, in making a change in the Constitution, to make as little change as may be necessary to accomplish the object. Having in mind what I consider to be the certainty that Congress in the future will always submit these amendments to the people instead of to the legislatures or to conventions, if this amendment shall be ratified, I do not consider it essential to put in the ratification of the people as an exclusive method of ratification; but I am perfectly willing to have it go in if the Senate wants it in, or it can be put in in conference, or by the House, if the House prefers it that way, when this matter goes to the House.

Another reason why I would not like to offer such an amendment on the floor now is that I reported the joint resolution as the action of the committee, and I could offer the amendment personally, but I could not speak for the committee in advocating such an amendment.

It has been suggested to me since this amendment was reported from the committee that the Supreme Court, in passing on the language of the Constitution which provides that whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary Congress may submit an amendment, has recently decided that two-thirds of both Houses means two-thirds of a quorum of both Houses, which may mean much less than a majority, even, of each House, because a quorum consists of a bare majority in each House, and two-thirds of a bare majority would be just one-third, which is less than a majority, if I am correct in my figures; so that you have a small fraction of both branches proposing a constitutional amendment, instead of two-thirds of the membership of both branches, which I think was really intended by the framers of the Constitution to be the constitutional requirement. So I am going to suggest as an amendment, solely on my own responsibility, that the joint resolution as proposed be amended so as to read:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds (of the Members) of both Houses shall deem it necessary—

So that it would require two-thirds of the total membership of each House to approve such a joint resolution. I think that would be a wise provision. I am not going to insist upon it if there is an objection, because I do not want to imperil the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. President, I hesitate to press this matter to a vote this morning, not by reason of any fear of the result, but it is perfectly evident that there is not a quorum present at this minute; and inasmuch as the Constitution requires two-thirds to vote, I do not want to be responsible for taking what I regard as an important action with so few Members present. I am perfectly willing that it shall go to a vote if that is the regular order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I simply want to suggest that if the Senator is going to urge a vote on the joint resolution, I shall object.

Mr. ASHURST. I am sure I should not urge a vote upon it. The Senator from Connecticut will be in charge of the joint resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator will bear in mind the language I used, that if there was objection I should not press the amendment. I will not press the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I again thank the Senate for granting me this additional time.

My attention was drawn to this proposed reform or change in our Federal Constitution, not by any original thought within myself, but I think the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] was the first person who suggested the same change, and I recall in the Judiciary Committee the words of the distinguished President pro tempore, who now presides over this Chamber, that if he could have his way there would be no intervening body whatever in the matter of proposing amendments to the people's fundamental law; that the people themselves should say, and they should alone say, under what sort of Government they desired to live.

Mr. President, this proposed amendment, if submitted by the Congress and ratified by the States, would change Article V of the Federal Constitution in two particulars, namely:

First. It would require the States to ratify or reject an amendment within six years from the date the amendment was proposed by the Congress.

Second. It would grant power to the Congress to submit an amendment to the qualified electors of the States as well as to the legislatures and to conventions.

Counting the woman-suffrage amendment, we have had 19 amendments to the Federal Constitution. I will treat the first 10 amendments as a part and parcel of the original Constitution, because when the Constitution was ratified it was upon the distinctly implied, in some cases expressed, understanding that amendments would be adopted. They were proposed and submitted by the First Congress on the 15th of September, 1789. They were 12 in number. The third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth were ratified by the required number of States within exactly two years and three months. But No. 1 and No. 2 are still pending, and on the 15th day of this present month had been pending 130 years.

So we perceive a wise suggestion in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] that there should be a time limit. Moreover, we have precedent. Congress, in submitting the prohibition amendment, laid a limit upon the time within which the State could ratify.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the last 9 amendments—eliminating the first 10—have been brought about by "amendment periods." The eleventh and twelfth were adopted in the 10-year period between 1794 and 1804, the twelfth having been brought about by the unfortunate tie between Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr. Call that the first amendment period. Then, notwithstanding the fact that many score of amendments were introduced in Congress and two were proposed between 1804 and 1864, no amendment was adopted; thus there was a 60-year period of immobility with respect to amending our Federal Constitution.

Then came the second amendment period, which began in 1865 and lasted until 1875. In that 10-year period the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments were proposed and adopted.

There came another period of nearly 40 years of silence, and then came the sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, and, treating the woman-suffrage amendment as adopted, the nineteenth amendment—the third amendment period (1909 to 1919)—showing that these amendments move in great cycles.

The Federal Constitution conserves and protects all that real Americans hold precious; it should not be changed by legislative caucus, but by the direct vote of the people.

There is not a State in the Federal Union whose constitution may be amended by the State legislature. The various State constitutions may be amended only by the electorate of the State. How utterly archaic, therefore, it is to deny the electorate an opportunity to express itself upon the proposed change in our fundamental law.

If the consent of the voters be required to alter and amend a State constitution, a fortiori, the vote of the people should be required to change the Federal Constitution.

It is vital to our American system that the voter should have an opportunity to say at the ballot box what form of government he desires to live under.

If you are not willing that the State legislatures should choose United States Senators, for a much stronger reason the State legislatures should not change your fundamental law.

Every argument in favor of the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people is a stronger argument in favor of consulting the people on constitutional amendments.

I favored the amendments providing for the income tax, direct election of Senators, prohibition, and woman suffrage. I believe they were wise amendments, and that they were in response to the deliberate judgment and progressive thought of a vast majority of our countrymen; indeed, I believe those amendments were demanded by the people and were not forced upon the people. My belief, unfortunately, does not settle the question; for the stubborn fact exists that millions of our countrymen thoroughly believe that the prohibition and woman-suffrage amendments were adopted by cunning, by craftiness and indirection, and that the Congress and the State legislatures were either browbeaten into voting for the amendments or were induced to do so by an insidious lobby. It is my personal opinion that if a referendum to the people on the prohibition and woman-suffrage amendments could have been had, each amendment would have been adopted and ratified by at least a three-fourths majority of the electors. We should, therefore, take the requisite steps to preclude the opportunity in the future of a recurrence of such discontent and suspicion by providing a means by which the electors of each State may pass upon amendments to the Federal Constitution.

Mr. President, there are 435 Members of the House of Representatives and 96 Members of the Senate, in all 531. I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD, at this point in my remarks, a statement showing the exact number of State senators, number of members of the house or assembly, as the case may be, in the State legislatures.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Number of members in State legislatures.

State.	Senate.	House or assembly.
Alabama	35	106
Arizona	19	35

Wyoming	27	57
	1,760	5,643

Members of senates	1,760
Members of houses or assemblies	5,643
Total	7,403

Mr. ASHURST. So we have a total of 7,403 members of the State legislatures, and, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] says, a majority of that 7,400—not two-thirds, but a bare majority of that 7,400 men—may pass upon an amendment to the Constitution.

So we find ourselves in this posture: Two-thirds of the Congress and a majority of the 7,400, or about 4,500 men, pass upon the destiny of the most advanced people that ever lived in the tide of times. We set ourselves up as the leader among the nations in thought and as responsive to the people's will, and yet 4,500 men, if they saw fit, could Prussianize the Republic.

As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]—and I thank him for it—says, sotto voce, two-thirds of a quorum in Congress is all that is necessary.

Mr. President, it is startling to investigate and then reflect upon the perils that have come and that in the future may come by a continued failure to set a time limit within which a proposed amendment may be ratified.

Five different amendments duly proposed by the Congress are now pending before the States for their action. These amendments are as follows:

One, proposed September 15, 1789, 130 years ago, relating to enumeration and representation:

ARTICLE 1. After the first enumeration required by the first article of the Constitution there shall be one Representative for every 30,000 until the number shall amount to 100, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall be not less than 100 Representatives, nor less than one Representative for every 40,000 persons, until the number of Representatives shall amount to 200, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall not be less than 200 Representatives, nor more than one Representative for every 50,000 persons.

Another, proposed September 15, 1789, 130 years ago, relating to compensation of Members of Congress:

ART. 2. No law varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

One proposed May 1, 1810—109 years ago—to prohibit citizens of the United States from accepting presents, pensions, or titles from princes or from foreign powers:

If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever, from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States, and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them, or either of them.

One proposed, March 2, 1861—58 years ago—known as the Corwin amendment, prohibiting Congress from interfering with slavery within the States:

No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State. (12 Stat., 251.)

And the woman suffrage amendment proposed June 4, 1919:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

On September 15, 1789, 12 constitutional amendments were proposed by the First Congress. The requisite number of States ratified proposed articles numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 within exactly two years and three months, whilst Nos. 1 and 2, although proposed 130 years ago, have not, according to the latest available returns, received favorable action by the requisite number of States and are yet before the American people, or the States, rather, have been for 130 years, and are now subject to ratification or rejection by the States. After those two proposed amendments, to wit, Nos. 1 and 2, had been in nubibus—"in the clouds"—for 84 years, the Ohio State Senate in 1873, in response to a tide of indignation that swept over the land in opposition to the so-called "back-salary grab," resurrected proposed amendment No. 2 and passed a resolution of ratification through the State senate. No criticism can be visited upon the Ohio Legislature that attempted to ratify the amendment proposed in 1789, and if the amendment had been freshly proposed by Congress at the time of the "back-salary grab" instead of having been drawn forth from musty tomes, where it had so long lain idle, stale, and dormant, other States doubtless would have ratified it during the period from 1873 to 1881.

Thus it would seem that a period of 130 years, or 84 years, within which a State may act is altogether too long, and I will support a proposition limiting the time to 6, 8, or 10 years within which a State may act under a particular submission, so that we will not hand down to posterity a conglomerate mass of amendments floating around in a cloudy, nebulous haze, which a State here may resurrect and ratify, and a State there may galvanize and ratify.

We ought to have homogeneous, steady, united exertion, and certainly we should have contemporaneous action with reference to these various proposed amendments. Judgment on the case should be rendered within the ordinary lifetime of those interested in bringing about the change in our fundamental law. Final action should be had while the discussions and arguments are within the remembrance of those who are called upon to act.

There is still another reason why a time limit should be set: When the 12 amendments were submitted in 1789 there were only 13 States. Vermont had not been admitted, if I remember correctly.

Question: Should three-fourths of the States then in the Union or three-fourths of those now in the Union be the test as to what shall be the number required for ratification?

The amendment proposed on May 1, 1810, was submitted to the States under the most interesting and peculiar auspices that ever came before a legislative body, and was as follows:

If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them, or either of them.

What was the reason for that proposed amendment? History does not disclose, but the reason was that when officials accept presents of great value they dissolve the pearl of independence in the vinegar of obligation.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizone yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator does not have in mind, I take it—or has he in mind—the very valuable and numerous presents brought back to this country by those in executive and diplomatic place affecting to represent the United States abroad?

Mr. ASHURST. I know, nothing, Mr. President, about any presents received by anybody. I do not know anything about that. But if any Democrat has received any present, he would receive my condemnation just as quickly as though he were a Republican. It is one of the habits of the majority party to receive presents, and I do not want the Democratic Party to get into that habit.

Mr. PENROSE. To state the matter bluntly, I am told that the President came back to this country laden and overburdened with presents from crowned heads and foreign governments——

Mr. ASHURST. I am sure the Senator from Pennsylvania does not believe that.

Mr. PENROSE. And that even the ladies in the Executive party brought back jewelry worth many hundreds of thousands of dollars. An official of the customhouse, I was informed, stated that jewelry amounting to $1,000,000 had been brought back by one of the party on a recent trip.

Mr. ASHURST. In the first place, Mr. President, I know of no ladies who are holding any office at this time under the Federal Government; and, secondly, I am not in the business of attacking women, anyhow.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not in the business, either, of attacking anybody; but I am simply stating a fact, that the presidential party, including the ladies of the party, brought back to this country presents from crowned heads and foreign governments amounting to several million dollars, and I was anxious to know whether the Senator from Arizona had referred to this constitutional amendment as applicable to modern cases.

Mr. ASHURST. I will read the amendment proposed in 1810, and the Senator may see to whom it would apply. This amendment was proposed, and is still pending, and with the views of the Senator from Pennsylvania as stated, I hope to enlist him for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. This proposed amendment read:

If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept or retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States, and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them, or either of them.

Unfortunately, the annals of Congress and contemporary newspapers do not give any of the debate upon this interesting proposition. The only light thrown upon the subject by the annals is the remark of Mr. Macon, who said "he considered the vote on this question as deciding whether or not we were to have members of the Legion of Honor in this country." What event connected with our diplomatic or political history suggested the need of such an amendment is not now apparent, but it is possible that the presence of Jerome Bonaparte in this country a few years previous, and his marriage to a Maryland lady, may have suggested this measure.

An article in Niles's Register (vol. 72, p. 166), written many years after this event, refers to an amendment having been adopted to prevent any but native-born citizens from being President of the United States. This is, of course, a mistake, as the Constitution in its original form contained such a provision; but it may be possible that the circumstances referred to by the writer in Niles relate to the passage of this amendment through Congress in regard to titles of nobility. The article referred to maintains that at the time Jerome Bonaparte was in this country the Federalist Party, as a political trick, affecting to apprehend that Jerome might find his way to the Presidency through "French influence," proposed the amendment. The Federalists thought the Democratic Party would oppose it as unnecessary, which would thus appear to the public as a further proof of their subserviency to French influence. The Democrats, to avoid this imputation, concluded to carry the amendment. "It can do no harm" was what reconciled it to all.

That amendment was submitted 109 years ago, and it was ratified within two years by Maryland, Kentucky, Ohio, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Vermont, Tennessee, Georgia, North Carolina, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. It was rejected by two or three of the States. At one period of our national life the school-book histories and the public men stated that it was a part of our organic law, because in the early days of our Government the Secretary of State did not send messages to Congress announcing ratification or promulgate to the public any notice whatever as to when an amendment became a part of the Constitution. I have caused the journals, records, and files in the Department of State to be searched, and there may not be found any notice of any proclamation or promulgation of the ratification of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution. The States assumed—it was not an unwarranted or violent assumption—that when the requisite number of States had ratified an amendment it was then and there a part of our organic law.

When the War between the States began to throw its shadow over the land, men rushed here and there with a compromise to heal the breach, if possible, and tried to avert the shock that was apparently about to come to our governmental structure. Expedient after expedient was proposed, and just before the adjournment of Congress—to wit, on March 2, 1861—the following amendment, known as the Corwin amendment, to the Constitution of the United States was proposed to the States, and it read as follows:

No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State. (12 Stat., 251.) Proposed by Congress March 2, 1861.

That amendment was proposed by Congress on the 2d of March, 1861, and I warrant there are not 5,000 people in the United States to-day who know that such an amendment is now pending before the various States of the Union for their ratification. The amendment was ratified by the State of Ohio and by the State of Maryland through their legislatures and by the State of Illinois in 1862 by a convention.

Thus we perceive that a system which permits of no limitation as to the time when an amendment may not be voted upon by the State is not fair to posterity nor to the present generation. It keeps historians, publishers, and annalists, as well as the general public, constantly in doubt.

Having searched closely as to whether there is in the Constitution itself any expressed or implied limitations as to when an amendment may not be adopted, I am driven irresistibly to the conclusion that an amendment to the Constitution, once having been duly proposed, although proposed September 15, 1789, could not be recalled even by the unanimous vote of both Houses, if the Congress wished the same recalled, because the power to submit an amendment is specifically pointed out; but no power is given to recall it, and silence is negation.

I am not without authority on this subject, and I wish to include in the RECORD some data I have collected on this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time for the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII has expired.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. I should like to conclude my remarks on the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] gave notice that he would address the Senate at this time.

Mr. ASHURST. I am like a man pardoned out of the penitentiary, I was not allowed to finish my sentence. I was cut off by the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, but I should like to finish.

Mr. REED (to Mr. ASHURST). Go ahead.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I will conclude by saying that I realize this is a serious matter, that this proposed constitutional amendment can not be disposed of in the morning hour, but I feel the debate has not been without some value to us all, and I am glad to note there is such unanimity of expression of opinion favorable to the resolution.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to say that there is no unanimity on it, but very resolute opposition to it.

Mr. ASHURST. For the first time I now know that the Senator from Oklahoma intends to deprive the people of the United States of voting upon what kind of government they wish to live under.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Arizona does not interpret correctly the "Senator from Oklahoma."

Mr. ASHURST. I am a very accurate interpreter, I think, and I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether he would prefer having 5,000 men pass on our Constitution or all of the voting people, men and women of our country? Does he prefer a constitution like Mexico or one of the people?

Mr. OWEN. The amendment which I offered a few moments ago, Senate joint resolution 33, called the "Gateway amendment," deprives the minority of either House or a minority of the States from preventing a proposed amendment to the Constitution being submitted to the people, as the pending resolution proposes, and places it in the hands of the people by majority vote of a majority of the congressional districts and a majority of all votes cast and permits amendments to be proposed by a majority of the Members either of the United States Senate or the House of Representatives. The proposed amendment which I offered fully sets forth my views. I shall be content with nothing less. I am utterly opposed to minority rule and will submit to it no longer than I am compelled to do so.

Mr. ASHURST. Then if the Senator has offered such an amendment as that he has offered one that will give the people more authority and has performed a valuable service.

Mr. OWEN. It not only gives the people more authority but enables a majority of their Representatives in either House to submit proposed amendments to the Constitution, which the majority of either House believe the people want. I demand the right of the people to rule be put in concrete form and without delay.

Minority rule in this Nation is now threatening to bring about mob rule as a remedy, which is another form of minority rule even more dangerous and chaotic in tendency than the present order.

Majority rule is the safe and middle course, and it is of urgent immediate importance. At present, anything in excess of one-third of the House or Senate membership or in excess of one-fourth of the States can block the right of the people to amend the Constitution, and organized financial and commercial power controls by this means the veto power against the majority of the people.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in his speech on August 22 reached heights of true eloquence. Concluding with a noble peroration, the Senator said:

I sometimes picture this great Republic as a majestic image, towering to the clouds from an eternal anchorage of justice and ordered liberty, its benignant features bathed in the eternal sunlight of heaven, its invincible arms extended above our continent-covering domain, shielding, protecting, encouraging. May such an image find sanctuary in the hearts of every man and woman and child under the national ensign, quickening their affection, stimulating their patriotism, and ministering to their sense of civic responsibility.

I devoutly share the hope expressed by the Senator from Colorado, whose genius spread that sublime picture before us, that "such an image will find sanctuary in the heart of every man and woman under the national ensign." But while it is true that the heroic image of our American institutions lifts its head into the clouds, it is also true that it is neither anchored securely nor anchored at all; it stands upon a fragile pivot, the will of five thousand men; but if we see to it that the charter of American freedom shall not be changed except by a vote of the people then this heroic image will be supported by a pivot, the will of the people, a diamond pivot upon whose unbreakable, infrangible strength the destiny of the Republic may safely and easily revolve.

APPENDIX.

DISCUSSION OF CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS INVOLVED.

(Jameson.)

SEC. 585. VI. Two further questions may be considered: (1) When Congress has submitted amendments to the States, can it recall them? and (2) How long are amendments thus submitted open to adoption or rejection by the States?

1. The first question must, we think, receive a negative answer. When Congress has submitted amendments, at the time deemed by itself or its constituents desirable, to concede to that body the power of afterwards recalling them would be to give to it that of definitely rejecting such amendments, since the recall would withdraw them from the consideration of the States and thus render their adoption impossible. However this may be, it is enough to justify a negative answer to say that the Federal Constitution, from which alone Congress derives its power to submit amendments to the States, does not provide for recalling them upon any event or condition, and that the power to recall can not be considered as involved in that to submit as necessary to its complete execution. It therefore can not exist.

2. The same consideration will, perhaps, furnish the answer to the second question. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to submit amendments to the States; that is, either to the State legislatures or to conventions called by the States for this purpose, but there it stops. No power is granted to prescribe conditions as to the time within which the amendments are to be ratified, and hence to do so would be to transcend the power given. The practice of Congress in such cases has always conformed to the implied limitations of the Constitution. It has contented itself with proposing amendments, to become valid as parts of the Constitution, according to the terms of that instrument. It is, therefore, possible, though hardly probable, that an amendment once proposed is always open to adoption by the nonacting or nonratifying States.

The better opinion would seem to be that an alteration of the Constitution proposed to-day has relation to the sentiment and the felt needs of to-day, and that, if not ratified early, while that sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist, it ought to be regarded as waived and not again to be voted upon unless a second time proposed by Congress.

SEC. 586. In discussing the question of the right of the States to vote upon proposed amendments at any time after the date of their proposal it is proper to look into the consequences of such a right. If they have the right there are now floating about us, as it were, in nubilous, several amendments to the Constitution proposed by Congress which have received the ratification of one or more States but not of enough to make them valid as parts of that instrument. Congress could not withdraw them, and there is in force in regard to them no recognized statute of limitations. Unless abrogated by amendments subsequently adopted they are, on the hypothesis stated, still before the American people to be adopted or rejected.

In 1873 the Senate of Ohio, acting upon the theory that once proposed an amendment to the Constitution is always open to ratification, adopted a joint resolution ratifying the second of the 12 amendments submitted to the States by Congress in 1789, but then rejected, providing that "no law varying the compensation of Members of Congress shall take effect until an election for Representative shall have intervened." This resolution, prepared by Madison, was an excellent one; but suppose it had been unjust, proposed, perhaps, in the interest of a section or of a party, and, failing at the time to receive the requisite majority, it had subsequently by a concerted rally of those interested in its adoption been carried without discussion or a clear expression of the existing public will; is that a true construction of the Constitution which may be followed by so dangerous consequences? And, supposing the right referred to exists, by what majority shall the resurrected amendments be adopted? If proposed in 1789, when the States numbered but 13 and when a majority of 10 States might have ratified the amendment, how many would have been requisite in 1873, when there were 38 States which would have been called upon to vote? If the answer should be that 29 States must have voted to ratify, since that number was three-fourths of all the States in 1873, however reasonable such an answer might seem, it would be founded upon no statute or custom of the country, and therefore different opinions as to its reasonableness might well be entertained. Hence the danger of confusion or conflict. We discuss this question here merely to emphasize the dangers involved in the Constitution as it stands and to show the necessity of legislation to make certain those points upon which doubts may arise in the employment of the constitutional process for amending the fundamental law of the Nation. A constitutional statute of limitation prescribing the time within which proposed amendments shall be adopted or be treated as waived ought by all means to be passed. (Jameson, John A. A treatise on constitutional conventions (4th ed., 1887), pp. 634–636.)

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask permission of the Senator from Massachusetts to offer an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which I desire to have printed and lie on the table. I rose to offer the amendment and was precluded from doing so by the closing of the morning hour.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I have no objection to the Senator offering an amendment to be printed.

The amendment by Mr. OWEN is to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That Article V of the Constitution shall be amended so as to read:

"This Constitution may be amended in the following manner and in no other way: An amendment or amendments or the calling of a constitutional convention may be proposed—

"By a majority vote of the Members enrolled in each House of Congress.

"By either House should the other House twice reject the proposal, and a failure for three months to act favorably shall constitute a rejection.

"Congress shall propose an amendment or amendments or the calling of a constitutional convention when requested by a majority of the State legislatures.

"Congress or either House may submit competing measures.

"Proposed amendments shall be transmitted by the Secretary of State to the secretaries of state of the several States of the Union for submission to such of the voters of the several States as are qualified to vote for the election of Members of the House of Representatives. To each voter there shall be mailed a copy of the proposals and a copy of the arguments, for and against, prepared by two committees composed of leading representatives of the opposing sides; and the entire expense shall be borne by the Government of the United States. Not less than two nor more than four months shall elapse between the time of issuing the voters' pamphlet and the date of the referendum vote.

"The returns shall be transmitted to the House of Representatives, and the will of a double majority shall prevail—a majority of those who vote on the measure in a majority of the congressional districts and a majority of all the votes cast thereon: Provided, however, That no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained from the Senate by illness. I wish also to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are detained from the Senate on public business.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is detained on public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Seventy-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in a number of recent speeches the President has declared that the assembly of the league of nations is largely "a debating society."

He has also said:

We can always offset with one vote the British six votes. I must say that I look with perfect philosophy upon the difference in number.

The distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], who has been justly recognized as one of the spokesmen of the President, declared on the floor of the Senate on August 20, as follows:

Mr PITTMAN. Mr. President, this league of nations as it is construed by the President—and he is convinced, so he says, that the other framers agree with him—is hardly more to-day than a meeting place where the consensus of opinion of the civilized world may be obtained and the moral force brought to bear.

The above doctrine has been widely disseminated throughout the Union. The effort is to coax the people into the league by the claim that it is an innocuous and harmless thing.

But on other occasions the advocates of the league assert it is possessed of sufficient power to control the passions and ambitions of the world and hold in leash the armed forces of mankind. Both of these views can not be correct.

The truth is to be found in the written covenant now under consideration. I therefore venture to invite your attention to the language of that instrument.

But before I attempt that task, permit me to make a few observations in order to remove certain false arguments which have been advanced for the purpose of beclouding the issue.

I ask permission, Mr. President, to insert at the close of my remarks certain remarks made by Hon. Lee Meriwether, recently one of the representatives of our Government at Paris, certain remarks made by Gov. Glynn in his keynote speech at the St. Louis Democratic national convention which nominated the President in 1916, and certain experts from a letter written by Hon. Edward E. Yates, one of the most distinguished lawyers and Democrats of the Central West.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the great question confronting the American people ought to be settled by a sober appeal to reason. Viewed in any light, its importance can not be overestimated. According to the President, it is to usher in "a new age," which he asserts will lift mankind to the highest levels. In the opinions of others, it involves the sacrifice of American sovereignty, plunges our Republic into the wars of the world, and jeopardizes the future of mankind.

Whichever view is correct the question is one of the deepest gravity. Its solution is fraught with infinite good or unspeakable ill to the world. Such a problem can only be solved by the study of facts and by the application of sound reason. If the President is right, then surely the case can be won by an appeal to the intellect of the American people.

The President has spent eight months in Europe helping frame this document, which contains first and last 80,000 words. He has, or he should have, intimate knowledge of all its terms and ought to be capable of demonstrating by cool reason and by the citation of the terms of the instrument that it will benefit mankind. The people had the right to expect that in his tour across the continent he would convey to them an intimate and concise knowledge of the contract into which he proposes to force the country and that he would make plain to them every doubtful proposition, but—

If a citizen refuses to repudiate the policies under which our country has become great, the President characterizes him as "pygmy minded."

If he declines to turn his back upon Washington and Jefferson, he is described as afflicted "with curious aberrations of thinking."

If he refuses to surrender with the pen what Washington gained with the sword, he is politely described as a "contemptible quitter."

If he can not see his way clear to embroil America in the wars of every country and to plunge her into controversies of every land, he sees with "jaundiced eyes."

If he venture to point out that article 10 binds us to send our soldiers to defend the frontiers of every land in every quarter of the globe, he is "afflicted with amazing ignorance."

If he looks with pride upon the glorious achievements of America's past and refuses to abandon the policies which have brought us to the heights of prosperity, he is "a dreamer living in the forgotten age."

If after studying the league covenant lawyers and statesmen reach the conclusion that it is inimical to the public weal, they are classified as men "whose heads are only fit to serve as knots to prevent their bodies from unraveling."

If Senators of the United States, sworn to defend the Constitution and to protect the Republic in strict accordance with the terms of their oaths, study the proposed covenant and reach the conclusion that it is their duty not to advise or consent to its ratification, they are denounced as "dishonest opponents of the treaty who will be gibbeted and who will regret that the gibbet is so high."

Or, again, they are informed, as the President did declare in Washington a few weeks ago, that he would like to see them

"hung on a gibbet as high as heaven, but pointed in the opposite direction."

And so the resistless argument proceeds.

The President marshals his syllogisms as a general marshals the battalions of his army. They appear to advance in logical phalanx, but his soldiers are epithets; his battalions aggregations of bitter names; his army an assemblage of denunciatory epigrams.

Yet after it has passed the calm onlooker will recognize only the vapors of anger; the intemperance autocracy manifests at opposition.

If I could be so unkind as to reply in kind, I might answer that, of course, the President does it all unconsciously, in complete innocence, and possibly only when wrought upon by the "new magic." And that he substitutes fancies for facts, confuses the phantasms of his dreams with the actualities of life, mistakes the visions of ambition for the inspiration of idealism, and imagines that phrases can take the place of realities.

The President talks much of "duty of sacrifice," but even while he speaks, he, at Government expense, rides on special trains; sails upon magnificent ships, fitted with special glass pavilions; lives in the palaces of princes; receives presents from foreign nobility worth hundreds of thousands of dollars; commandeers entire hotels; summonses armies of retainers; creates diplomats without law; and wages war without authority.

Out of the public funds he provides the keep of his retainers. He compels the American taxpayers to furnish their food and to wash their dirty linen. He talks of sacrifices, but the sacrifices are to be made by American boys who perish in the snows of Siberia or who are yet to die beneath the suns of the Equator.

We stopped the onrushing Germans at the Marne, broke their attack at Chateau-Thierry, rolled them back at the Argonne, and forced their representatives to surrender at Paris.

Our Armies rescued our allies.

Our food fed them.

Our money maintained them.

To accomplish this work we left 50,000 dead in France, and sent staggering over our land another 50,000 brave men, blind, crippled, diseased.

We accumulated a debt of $20,000,000,000.

We disarmed Germany and dismembered Austria.

Having done all this, if we now say that the time has arrived to bring our soldiers home and to begin looking after the wants of our own people, we are "contemptible quitters."

Asserting that the league will bring universal peace, the President yet demands a standing Army of a half million men.

Insisting that war will be no more, he urges the doctrine of universal military training.

Proclaiming that the day has come when swords are to be beaten into plowshares, he demands millions for a Navy.

He advocates freedom of the seas, but consents that England shall remain mistress of the waters of the world.

He chafes at being kept at his presidential duties in Washington when he has been in this country only 60 days in the past 9 months.

He makes a speech declaring his own opinions and the next day asserts that his own speech is a solemn instruction by the people which he is dutifully carrying into effect.

He hears the echo of his own words, and the next day proclaims them the voice of God.

He denounces secret treaties, yet seeks to engage his country in a contract ratifying and confirming secret and cruel treaties by which our own Allies have been despoiled.

He preaches open covenants, openly arrived at, yet goes into secret conclaves and seizes cable lines and permits a censorship of European news.

He refuses to inform the Senate concerning his vote on racial equality, pleading that he would thereby disclose secrets which would cause international embarrassment, although the public statement of the Japanese statesman Baron Goto that Wilson and House had both voted with Japan on racial equality has for weeks gone unchallenged and undisputed. I insert that interview.

HOW DID PRESIDENT WILSON VOTE ON THE JAPANESE QUESTION OF RACIAL EQUALITY?

Testimony on August 20, 1919, before Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate:

The President referred to the fact that the Japanese had presented a resolution for racial equality, "but rather as an expression of opinion or hope, and it was not pressed for action."

Senator JOHNSON. May I ask, if permissible, how the representatives of the United States voted upon that particular proposition?

The PRESIDENT. I think it is very natural that you should ask that. I am not sure that I am at liberty to answer, because that touches the intimacy of a great many controversies that occurred in that conference, and I think it is best, in the interests of international good understanding, that I should not answer.

The facts as admitted by Baron Goto, member of Japan's Supreme Council on Foreign Relations. This interview has never been denied.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 20, 1919.]

NEW YORK, April 19, 1919.

In an astonishingly frank interview Baron Goto declared that Japan considered herself the spokesman of all oriental peoples, and, having already obtained the support of President Wilson, would not give up her fight for racial equality.

"Both President Wilson and Col. House voted with Japan for racial equality at the peace conference," Goto said.

Because the Members of the Senate have not in answer to his dictation immediately approved the treaty he has in substance charged them with treasonable practices by intimating that they are now conspiring with Germany, a country with which we are still technically at war.

The statement is as false as it is infamous.

He goes about the country denouncing the Senate for the delay in passing upon the treaty, yet he refused to give to the Senate the practically completed draft of the treaty, although it was in the possession of all the chancelleries of Europe and was being sold upon the streets of Berlin and authenticated copies of it were in the hands of the great bankers of New York City.

He complains of delay, yet his adherents in the Senate conducted a filibuster to prevent the publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to the country of an advance copy of the treaty.

He complains of delay, yet he withheld from the Senate the French treaty, which by express terms was to be laid before the Senate at the same time the German treaty was submitted.

He complains of delay, yet he even now withholds documents important to the proper understanding of the treaties pending before the Senate.

Mr. President, no man regrets the necessity of these remarks more than myself; but the time has come when we will determine whether the Senate of the United States is a part of the Government set up by the people of the United States, and whether it shall proceed to exercise its functions without fear or favor, without coercion, and without abuse.

Let me interpolate, I am not speaking for the dignity of the Senate merely as a body of men here assembled. It is a part of the Government erected by the people; and whosoever denies to that part of the Government the full and untrammeled exercise of its powers seeks to usurp the powers of the people themselves.

Mr. President, I shall undertake now, by a reference to the documents and by citation of proof as I proceed, to demonstrate a number of propositions.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS UNDERTAKES TO ESTABLISH A SUPERGOVERNMENT OF THE WORLD.

It is in fact a superstate.

I shall undertake to demonstrate six propositions.

First. That whether the entity now sought to be created be described as a "league," a "confederation," or an "empire," it nevertheless sets up a superstate, with rights, powers, and authorities superior to those of its constituent members, who, upon acceptance of membership, become subject to its governing control.

Second. That it has the power of self-extension both as to its membership and its jurisdiction.

Third. That it possesses a supreme jurisdiction over all matters international and over many purely national rights and policies.

Fourth. That member nations may be deprived of their most sacred rights in defiance of the will of their people or their governments.

Fifth. That nonmember States may be forced to obey the mandates of the superstate, even though their inhabitants unanimously protest.

Sixth. That the bodies authorized to decide these important questions are purely political, controlled by self-interests, and lack in every essential the attributes of courts or tribunals of justice.

THE LEAGUE ESTABLISHES A SUPERSTATE.

The league when consummated will constitute a distinct entity with every element of an independent and sovereign power or State.

It will possess:

(1) A permanent capital or seat of government.

(2) A flag.

(3) A membership composed of colonies, dependencies, and nations.

(4) Governing bodies, composed of the representatives of the members.

(5) A permanent organized body called a secretariat, which corresponds to an executive branch of government.

(6) Authority of control or command over matters embraced within a broad jurisdiction expressly granted.

(7) Force to execute its commands, judgments, and decrees.

THE CAPITAL.

The league possesses a capital or seat of government, with the power to change and move this capital at will.

"The seat of the league is established at Geneva.

"The council may at any time decide that the seat of the league shall be established elsewhere. * * * Representatives of members of the league and officials * * * the buildings and other property occupied by the league or its officials * * * shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities." (Art. 7.)

The temporary capital buildings have already been secured.

The grounds for permanent buildings are being secured.

Soon we may expect to see the buildings of the world capital in process of erection.

THE FLAG.

A flag has always been defined as a "national standard." It is the visible sign of authority. Disrespect to a flag has always been regarded as an insult to the power it typifies. According to public press reports a league flag has already been adopted. It is the banner of the superstate being set up.

THE MEMBERSHIP.

Whether we regard the proposed organization as a mere international council or as a superstate, designed to govern the world, its membership is of vital importance. The character of the membership will determine the nature of its activities and measure its capacity for good or evil. Common prudence therefore demands a candid inquiry concerning our new partners and the influences likely to control their conduct. The table I have compiled shows:

Dark countries.					White countries.
Country.	Year estimated.	Population.	Percentage of dark and mixed races.	Percentage of illiteracy.	Country.	Population.	Percentage of illiteracy.

NOTE.—Figures are from Encyclopædia Britannica and Statesman's Yearbook.

An examination of the table discloses certain upstanding facts that:

(a) Counting Cuba, where miscegenation is commonly practiced, and race distinctions are not recognized, a majority of our partners belong to the dark-skinned races. It is therefore perfectly apparent that from the first a majority of the league will always vote for race equality.

(b) With the single exception of Japan, the degree of illiteracy among these dark-skinned peoples is alarmingly high. This fact demonstrates the backwardness of these peoples upon all questions of government, liberty, or morals.

(c) Approximately there are three dark-skinned men in the league for each white man in the league.

(d) The following countries, all populated by whites, are left out of the league and constitute the major portion of the white population of the earth:

WHITE NATIONS WHO ARE NOT MEMBERS OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

I—States excluded from the league of nations covenant.

Sweden	5,757,566	.2
Switzerland	3,880,000	.3
Total	21,553,552	.34

[1] No figures given, but about the same as Sweden.

White nations who are not members of the league of nations: Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, Germany, and Russia.

The total of the white population in the league now is 289,428,000.

States invited to accede to the covenant who have not joined: Denmark, Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, and Switzerland.

As the table shows, these States have a total white population of 21,553,552, and a degree of illiteracy of a little over three-tenths of 1 per cent—the lowest degree of illiteracy in the world.

III—States invited to accede to covenant who have professed willingness to do so.

State.	Population.	Per cent illiteracy.
Spain	20,747,893	58.7
Grand total	43,326,552	[1] 22.45
Total, excluding Spain	22,578,730	[2] 18.825

[1] Total average. [2] Average, excluding Spain.

Sources: Population from Statesman's Yearbook, 1918. Per cent illiteracy from estimates furnished by Bureau of Census to the New York World, World Almanac, 1918.

Spain has been invited to come in, and I understand has come in with her 20,000,000 of population; but the grand total shows that there are now outside of the league 343,326,552 white people.

(e) The member nations in every respect exhibit the widest contrast. Liberia contains only 50,000 civilized inhabitants. The total population of Hedjaz, civilized and uncivilized, is 300,000. Nevertheless, these and other insignificant countries are received into membership.

The absurd result is that a semibarbarous Bedouin has a representation in the league 368 times as great as an American, and 1,356 times as great as a Chinaman. Likewise a partially civilized negro from Liberia has representation equal to 2,200 white Americans, or 2,200 colored Americans, and the colored American of this country is as much outraged, as a matter of fact, by this provision as are the whites.

Embracing every kind of State from the most powerful nations to subject countries and dependent colonies; ranging in civilization from the basest barbarism to the most advanced culture; in learning from the depths of ignorance to the heights of knowledge; in religion from the divine doctrines of Christianity to the child sacrifices of voodooism; in government from the democracy of liberty and equality to the despotism of chains and slavery, the membership presents an inharmonious blending of divergent races, conditions, and civilizations incapable of either a common interest or a common destiny.

Is it not written, "Thou shalt not yoke the ox and the ass together"?

With the exception of the British Empire each of these countries, of whatsoever degree or kind, has exactly the same representation in the league of nations as the United States. I would not be misunderstood. They are not all represented on the council, but they are all members.

THE PREDOMINANCE OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

Anomalous as are the facts to which I have adverted, they are nevertheless aggravated by the circumstance that the British Empire is given directly and immediately six times as many votes as the United States.

That was true until about the day before yesterday, when it was discovered that six is the exact mathematical equal of one. This result is accomplished by allowing a membership and a vote for Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India. Each of the countries named, while constituting only a fractional part of the Empire, is given a full vote in the assembly and is qualified for every place in the assembly. At the same time the Empire, composed in part of these fractions, is given a full vote.

The power of the British Empire to so increase its vote as to gain a complete dominance will be discussed later.

For the present I call attention to the fact that under the right to admit into full membership self-governing dominions, colonies, and States, Great Britain can at any time furnish a large number of lusty applicants for admission, who will be completely under her control and responsive to her will. The British Empire alone has an abundance of raw material out of which to create these new members. I shall return to that in a moment.

THE GOVERNMENT.

The league possesses the power of self-extension as to both its membership and jurisdiction. The government of the league is divided into three branches:

(1) The assembly, to consist of—

(a) One voting representative of each of the present members;

(b) One representative of each member of the league hereafter created.

(2) The council, the membership of which is divided into three classes:

(a) The permanent membership, namely, the representatives of Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States, five in all.

(b) Four temporary or removable members. The present temporary members are the representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Greece, and Spain.

(c) Additional members which may be created as hereinafter pointed out. (Art. 4.)

(3) The secretariat.

The secretariat shall comprise a secretary general and such secretaries and staff as may be required. (Art. 6.)

That is a brief résumé. Now, let us turn to the assembly. This is the point that has been misrepresented or misunderstood throughout the country. To the point I am now going to make, and the one which follows, I challenge the thought of Members of the Senate.

THE ASSEMBLY.

The assembly possesses the absolute power of self-extension. By a two-thirds vote it can admit or by a one-third plus one vote exclude from membership more than one-half of the total white population of the earth.

And that power is referred to as the power of a debating society.

It has been frequently asserted and widely published that the assembly possesses no power of importance; that it is, in fact, little more than an "international debating society"; and that therefore its membership is of little consequence.

This is the special defense offered to the protest against the six votes allowed the British Empire, it being asserted that the five votes allowed the British dominions and colonies will not count for anything of importance, because according to the claim they are votes only to be cast in the assembly.

That body is, as I have said, contemptuously referred to as "largely a debating society."

In his speech at Spokane on September 13, the President is quoted as saying:

The league of nations assembly is largely a debating body and seldom will act on important questions, and when it does the United States with its one vote will have absolute veto under the rule requiring a unanimous vote.

That statement has been printed and millions of copies sent throughout this land to people who never read the covenant of the league and have had no chance to read it.

I shall later show that the assembly possesses a very wide jurisdiction. But for the present I challenge attention to the fact that the present membership of the assembly has the power by a two-thirds vote to admit into the league or by a one-third plus one vote exclude from the membership of the league any of the following States:

Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, Germany, and Russia. These States are all populated by white peoples. Their importance and power is well understood. Their inhabitants number 301,025,178. The question whether they should be admitted or not may be vital, not only to the stability of the league but to the peace and safety of the world.

It is provided in the league covenant that the following European nations may join as of right, namely, Denmark, Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, and Spain, provided they shall join within two months after the going into force of the covenant. Of the States named, Spain has already indicated a willingness to join, but the other States have not.

Not counting Spain, they contain an aggregate population of 21,553,552 persons. They are among the most intelligent and highly educated people on earth, the degree of illiteracy being less than 0.4 per cent.

This is, in part, a repetition of what I have said, but I am trying to bring these matters together under topics.

In addition to the foregoing, the following States have been invited to join: Argentine Republic, Chile, Colombia, Paraguay, Persia, Salvador, and Venezuela, with a total population of 32,205,000.

Should any of these nations fail to join within the 60 days specified, then their admission may be accomplished by a two-thirds vote or their rejection by a one-third plus one vote of the assembly. In that event it would be within the power of the present membership to admit or exclude from membership the vast majority of the nations of Europe.

This power to admit into the league all these mighty nations or to reject them, in the latter instance by a one-third plus one vote, is the power to force upon us as partners some of the nations with which we have been recently at war, even though they may not have purged themselves of their offenses, even though every citizen of the United States should protest against it, for it is done by a two-thirds vote in the assembly, when we have but 1 vote out of a present vote of 32.

Upon the other hand, it is the power to unwisely exclude these and the nonoffending nations and to force all of the outside nations to unite themselves into an offensive and defensive alliance, thus separating the world into two great antagonistic organizations. Under such circumstances a single spark struck even in a remote and barbarous country may start a conflagration which will blaze around the world.

But, in addition to the States named, the league has the express right to receive other States. It is specifically recited:

Any fully self-governing State, dominion, or colony not named in the annex may become a member of the league if its admission is agreed to by two-thirds of the assembly. (Art. 1.)

Under the broad authority thus granted there is no limit to the membership which may be admitted except the lack of raw material.

Mr. President, I present here two tables, one of them a long list of States that are self-governing; another a long list of colonies which, if they are not absolutely self-governing, can be made self-governing by their respective countries within a few days' time. I shall not pause to read them. There is not one in the list that is not more entitled to membership than Liberia, that is not better qualified for membership than Haiti, and I could name some others. They take four pages of print. I shall print them as a part of my remarks, with the permission of the Senate.

[There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:]

Mr. REED. So that the power to let in the world or keep out the world, to name the conditions, and so forth, that I shall discuss in a minute, this immense power of consolidating the world in one mighty thing or excluding the world from it is a mere grant of that enormous power. It is the greatest power ever sought to be granted to any body of men.

The charter members of the assembly are composed of 32 men, one of whom is an American citizen, 31 of whom are aliens to us, and probably not more than 3 of them, unless they are exceptions to their people, can even speak our tongue.

I come now to another power.

THE ASSEMBLY HAS THE POWER TO DICTATE THE GUARANTEES WHICH SHALL BE GIVEN BY APPLICANTS FOR MEMBERSHIP.

The language of the covenant is:

Any fully self-governing State, dominion, or colony not named in the annex may become a member of the league if its admission is agreed to by two-thirds of the assembly: Provided, That it shall give effective guarantees of its sincere intention to observe its international obligations, and shall accept such regulations as may be prescribed by the league in regard to its military, naval, and air forces and armaments. (Art. 1.)

The power to receive or reject applicants for membership and the power to prescribe the nature and the character of the guarantees are found in a single sentence. Clearly the right to determine all these questions is lodged in the assembly.

The power to prescribe the nature and character of the guarantees may be so employed as to influence the conduct of any State seeking membership.

"What will constitute effective guarantees" rests wholly in the decision of the assembly. Should a State in dire necessity come into the league, guarantees might be exacted of such nature as to practically render it a vassal State or leave it so completely disarmed or crippled as to be without effective power of defense.

Notice that the language is that it shall accept the regulations, among other things, "in regard to its military, naval, and air forces and armaments."

It might be required to dismantle fortresses, to concede the control of navigable waters, or to even yield territory.

Upon the other hand, the only guarantees required might be a simple promise to abide by the rules of the league.

The power thus lodged is manifestly a great and important one, which can be so employed to the advantage of the dominant element in the league. States friendly to that element can be admitted upon generous terms; States unfriendly excluded or required to give such guarantees as to place them under control.

The results indicated may be regarded as certain to follow, for it must be remembered that in all international dealings nations have continuously held to the doctrine that it is the business of each State to have regard to its own interests. He who imagines that a membership in the league will change this century-old disposition is a visionary indeed.

Proof is found in the circumstances at this moment confronting us. Even as we form the league, and while the respective nations are proclaiming amity, good will, generosity, and disinterestedness with their lips, each is grabbing with both hands territories, peoples, and indemnities.

If, holding in sacred trust the rights of the American people, charged with the high duty of guarding their interests, we close our eyes to the plain facts of life and refuse to have regard for the lessons of history, we prove ourselves not only dreamers but fools.

WITHDRAWAL OF MEMBERS.

I now call attention to the withdrawal amendment. I want to get every Senator here to thinking about this question.

THE ASSEMBLY CAN DENY ANY STATE THE RIGHT TO WITHDRAW FROM THE LEAGUE.

THIS POWER IS FOUND IN THE AUTHORITY OF THE ASSEMBLY TO DECIDE WHETHER THE WITHDRAWING STATE HAS FULFILLED ALL ITS "INTERNATIONAL OBLIGATIONS AND ITS OBLIGATIONS UNDER THE COVENANT."

The provision regarding the withdrawal of members from the league is as follows:

Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal. (Art. 1.)

It will not be seriously contended that the State desiring to withdraw is entitled to decide for itself whether it has fulfilled all its international obligations and its obligations under the covenant.

Such a construction would deny to the league any jurisdiction over its members and would leave the case so that a State which had broken every obligation under the covenant, and every precept of international law, could also, without restriction, throw off its obligations of membership.

That is a denial of the very purpose alleged for the creation of the league, namely, that it is called into existence to decide international controversies and to prevent war by substituting its judgments for the will of individual nations.

It seems to me beyond dispute that the power of decision is therefore vested in the league.

The question, then, arises what tribunal of the league is to determine whether the applicant for withdrawal has fulfilled "all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant."

An examination of the context of the language just quoted seems to make the answer perfectly clear.

It will be observed that the provision touching withdrawal is found in the last paragraph of article 1. That article throughout deals with the question of league membership. It prescribes:

(a) Who the original members of the league are.

(b) That certain favored States named in the annex may become members, provided they shall join within two months after the league becomes effective. Otherwise they apparently forfeit their right to become members and fall into the class I next name.

(c) That any other "self-governing State, dominion, or colony may become a member by a two-thirds vote of the assembly upon giving effective guaranties that it will accept" regulations by the league in regard to "its military, naval forces, and armaments."

The foregoing clause is immediately followed by the provision that "any member of the league may withdraw after two years' notice of its intention so to do, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal."

It will be noticed that the entire article deals with the question of membership and that the only tribunal authorized by the article to take any action whatsoever is the assembly. It seems perfectly clear, therefore, that the assembly, and it alone, has the power to decide whether a withdrawing member has fulfilled its obligations.

It being clear that before a State can withdraw the assembly must decide whether or not it has "fulfilled all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant," the question arises must the assembly arrive at its decision—

(a) By a two-thirds vote;

(b) By a unanimous vote; or

(c) Is a majority vote sufficient?

Before we can answer this vital question we must determine whether the vote is governed by the provisions of article 1 or article 5; and if by the latter, whether the question is one involving a decision—I wish lawyers would bear that in mind—a decision or whether it is a mere "matter of procedure," in the former case a unanimous vote being required and in the latter only a majority vote.

As has been said, article 1 treats with the single subject of membership, and contains this clause:

> Any fully self-governing State, domain, or colony not named in the annex may become a member of the league if its admission is agreed to by two-thirds of the assembly.

Plainly enough a two-thirds vote can admit a member. But does the provision cover the last paragraph of article 1, which provides for the withdrawal of members, or is the withdrawal covered by the terms of article 5, which reads:

> EXCEPT WHERE OTHERWISE EXPRESSLY PROVIDED in this covenant or by the terms of the present treaty, decisions—

I call attention to that word "decisions"— > at any meeting of the assembly or of the council shall require the agreement of all the members of the league represented at the meeting.

>
> All matters of procedure—

I call attention to that language—

> at meeting of the assembly or of the council, including the appointment of committees to investigate particular matters, shall be regulated by the assembly or by the council and may be decided by a majority of the members of the league represented at the meeting.

It seems to me that it can hardly be claimed that the question whether a withdrawing State has fulfilled all its obligations under the league and all its international obligations can scarcely be regarded as a mere "matter of procedure." It involves a decision of both law and fact and is of a highly judicial character. Whereas matters of procedure relate generally to the matter of conducting business, in law it applies to the methods of pleading, introduction of evidence, and so forth, and is substantially synonymous with the words "practice" or "process."

It seems to me, therefore, that we must reject any thought that a State can be permitted to withdraw by a mere majority vote.

It remains to inquire whether the two-thirds vote provided for in article 1 or the unanimous vote required by article 5 must be obtained.

Turning to article 1 we find that the very language itself which provides for a two-thirds vote is limited to the clause relating to the admission of members. It reads, "If the admission is agreed to by two-thirds of the assembly." To no other parts or provisions of that article does the language seem to apply. In order to make it apply to the withdrawal of members we must change the language by writing into it "any fully self-governing dominion or colony not named in the annex may become a member" or may withdraw from membership, "if agreed to by two-thirds vote of the assembly."

We are not justified in so altering the language of the covenant. It is therefore my judgment that the decision is governed by the general provision of article 5 and requires a unanimous vote.

It is therefore very clear that if once we enter this league we can not escape its thralldom unless we can secure the gracious permission of every member of the assembly. In that case any State, however insignificant, by the casting of a single negative vote, could deny the United States the right of withdrawal by refusing to concur in the unanimous decision that the United States had "fulfilled all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant."

I am aware of that fact that the President in his interview with the Foreign Relations Committee took the opposite view, holding to the doctrine, which is to me astonishing, that the right of withdrawal is absolute and that "it is unconditional, so far as the legal or the moral right (of withdrawal) is concerned."

I quote now from the published report of the interview between the President and the Foreign Relations Committee:

> Senator BORAH. * * * Who passes upon the question of the fulfillment of our international obligations, upon the question whether a nation has fulfilled its international obligations?
>
> The PRESIDENT. Nobody.
> Senator BORAH. Does the council have anything to say about it?
>
> The PRESIDENT. Nothing whatever.
> Senator BORAH. Then, if a country should give notice of withdrawal, it would be the sole judge of whether or not it had fulfilled its international obligations—its covenants—to the league?
>
> The PRESIDENT. That is as I understand it. The only restraining influence would be the public opinion of the world.
> Senator BORAH. Precisely; but if the United States should conceive that it had fulfilled its obligations, that question could not be referred to the council in any way, or the council could not be called into action?
>
> The PRESIDENT. No.
> Senator BORAH. Then, as I understand, when the notice is given the right to withdrawal is unconditional?
>
> The PRESIDENT. Well, when the notice is given it is conditional on the faith of the conscience of the withdrawing nation at the close of the two-year period.
>
> Senator BORAH. Precisely; but it is unconditional, so far as the legal right or the moral right is concerned?
>
> The PRESIDENT. That is my interpretation.
> Senator BORAH. There is no moral obligation on the part of the United States to observe any suggestion made by the council?
>
> The PRESIDENT. Oh, no.
> (Hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee on the treaty, p. 507.)

If this view is correct, then it applies equally to the whole of the membership obligation.

Moreover, if we have the right at the end of two years to withdraw without the let or hindrance of any tribunal, even though we have not fulfilled our obligations under the covenant, then we can withdraw at any time before the period of two years. If we are not bound in the one instance, we are not in the other. Let us follow that.

When we enter the league we agree—

(a) To stay for at least two years;

(b) That we will fulfill all our international obligations and all our obligations under the covenant;

(c) That our right of withdrawal is dependent upon giving a two years' notice of our intention to withdraw.

If we are under no legal or moral duty to fulfill our obligations under the league before withdrawing neither are we under any obligation to give the 24 months' notice, for that is merely one of the obligations of the league, one of the conditions precedent to withdrawal.

If the doctrine announced is sound, it is difficult to understand why any nation might not at any time repudiate all its obligations under the league and declare none of them either legally or morally binding except as it may see fit to regard them as binding upon—and I quote the President—"the faith of the conscience of the withdrawing nation."

If the right to withdraw without having fulfilled the obligations under the league is circumscribed by "only the restraining influence of the public opinion of the world," then truly the entire chain of the league so carefully welded together may be broken at any moment without any notice whatsover by the withdrawal of any one or a dozen nations, even though they have not fulfilled their obligations under the league or their international obligations. All this may be done without incurring any other penalty than the "restraining influence of the public opinion of the world."

In my humble judgment, the construction contended for is unsound. But if it be sound, and if it be the view of the President, then it should be plainly written into the document.

I venture the assertion that the proponents of the league will lift their hands in horror and their voices in protest against an amendment which shall clearly express the right of each nation to decide for itself whether it has fulfilled its "international obligations and its obligations under the league," and thereupon to withdraw without the let or hindrance and without the decision of either the council or the assembly.

I challenge gentlemen to state their positions upon that. Bear in mind we are now writing a document, and the time when a lawyer clarifies a document is before it is signed and not afterwards. When the parties find themselves in dispute as to the meaning of a phrase, before they sign, always the lawyer ascertains then which view is correct and writes that into the instrument.

POWER TO CREATE AND CONTROL COUNCIL.

Now, Mr. President, I come to a topic of such importance and so fundamental that I again especially ask the kindest and most careful consideration. The assembly has the power to create and control the council.

The assembly has the power to elect four of the nine members of the council and thus make that body subservient to its will.

(1) As previously stated, there are five permanent members of the council, namely, the representatives of the British Empire, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States. There are four temporary or removable members. The temporary members are the representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Greece, and Spain. It is expressly stated in article 4 that:

These four members of the league shall be selected (as members of the council) by the assembly from time to time in its discretion. (Art. 4.)

The article continues:

Until the appointment of the representatives of the four members of the league first selected by the assembly, representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Greece, and Spain shall be members of the council. (Art. 4.)

The question at once arises by what vote does the assembly act in electing members of the council. Here again we are confronted with article 5. If the election of the four members of the council can be regarded as a "decision" by the assembly, then the vote must be unanimous, for article 4, which gives the power of election, fails to specify the kind of vote which shall be given in order to result in an election.

If the election requires a unanimous vote, then the absurd result follows that although Belgium, Brazil, Greece, and Spain are only named as temporary members of the council, and although it is expressly provided that the four temporary members of the council "shall be selected by the assembly from time to time in its discretion," nevertheless, the four temporary members when they have once been installed can never be ousted. This is so because no one of these nations would voluntarily relinquish its place upon the council, and it could not be ousted from that place so long as it refuses to consent to its own removal by joining in a unanimous vote to select another State as its successor. Accordingly, if the unanimous vote rule applies, then each of these States so named as temporary members of the council are in fact seated there forever. This construction would force the conclusion that the language inserted in article 4, "these four members of the council shall be selected by the assembly from time to time, in its discretion," is a mere fraud put upon the world.

Upon the other hand, if the election can be regarded as a matter of procedure, which I think is the better view, then the assembly may proceed by a majority vote. It follows that a simple majority of the assembly can easily dominate the council, for the power to elect at will four out of the nine members of the council can be easily so employed as to result in a complete control.

A simple illustration will suffice. It is inconceivable that the majority of the assembly should unite in electing four members of the council unless making a part of that majority, and probably directing its action would be found one or two great States, already represented among the permanent members of the council. In that event, the election of four additional members would assure a majority, and in the event that all of the five nations permanently represented on the council, or, indeed, four of them or three of them, were to act in accord in the election of the four temporary members, they could in this way oust nations from the council which refused to be subservient to their will and elect in their stead others that would join them in some desired unanimous decision.

The statement just made will be at once met by the claim that in that event the United States would not be harmed because the result referred to would only be brought about with her acquiescence. A moment's consideration, however, will show that circumstances might arise in which the power of the assembly could be employed to deprive us of a fair decision by the council in matters vital to our interests.

Assume that a controversy between the United States and Great Britain is impending and that the four temporary members of the council are friendly to the contention of the United States, whereas France, Italy, and Japan, being united with Great Britain by the closest ties, are friendly to her. Assume, further, that the nations just named are able to command, as they would probably be, a majority of votes in the assembly. That body could be immediately called into session. The four temporary members of the council could be at once ousted and the majority vote of the assembly employed to elect successors, every one of whom would be inimical to the United States. When the controversy between the United States and Great Britain then came before the council we would find ourselves and Great Britain excluded because of interest, but Great Britain would hold in the hollow of her hand the seven votes of the council and could secure a unanimous decision, having removed the four protesting members by the means I have suggested. A refusal on our part to obey would result in bringing upon us the united power of all the nations of the world solidified and bound together in the league or all the nations that could get in.

The case put may appear extreme, but careful consideration will show that it is not at all overdrawn. The conduct of the various nations at the peace conference demonstrate that each of the European and Asiatic nations are controlled alone by their self-interest. They are not disturbed by the illusions of idealism. In order to gain their ends they did not hesitate to make secret treaties, betraying their own allies. Before the smoke of carnage had cleared away they were striving to obtain every possible advantage.

These same selfish impulses and shrewd policies will continue to operate. From the moment the league is organized, or even in the process of its organization, each will seek to place its friends, satellites, and dependencies in positions of power so that if any question shall arise it will find itself stoutly fortified and prepared to secure a favorable decision. The British Empire is already so fortified.

I now take up another topic in connection with this question, and I call attention to the fact that the assembly, having the power to elect four of the nine members of the council by some vote—and I think by a majority vote—is referred to as a debating society, and we are told that the qualifications and character of its membership amount to nothing.

While the assembly can without the consent of the council add to its own membership, the council is powerless to add to its membership without the consent of the assembly.

The council may desire to add:

(a) To its permanent membership. In that event it must secure the permission of the assembly. Without that permission an increase in the permanent membership of the council can never be had. The power is a very important one and may be so exercised as to bar from permanent representation in the council any State not now enjoying that valuable advantage. The general language is:

With the approval of the majority of the assembly, the council may name additional members of the league whose representatives shall always be members of the council. (Art. 4.)

That is the permanent membership.

(b) Neither can the council increase its temporary or general membership without first obtaining the consent of the assembly. The language of the article is:

The council with like approval (the majority of the assembly) may increase the number of members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representation on the council. (Art. 4.)

The importance of these powers can scarcely be overemphasized. More than one-half of the white race are now outside of the league. It is natural to suppose in the process of time, if the league flourishes, that some of these nations may desire to enter the league. In the opinion of the United States and of a majority of the council, it may be highly desirable to admit one or more of these great States to the deliberations of the council, yet a bare majority of the assembly might be easily induced to refuse the council the right to increase its common or general membership. The infinite variety of circumstances which might make such action possible or, indeed, probable, lie in the womb of the future. What they may be we can not even conjecture, but the fact remains that there is vested in the assembly this great and potential control over the very composition of the council.

I desire to dispose of one further proposition, which has to do with the power of this superstate to change its very nature by changing the membership of both of its governing bodies.

The assembly and the council, acting jointly, can change the entire character of the league through the power of changing its membership and the membership of its governing bodies.

I have already shown that the assembly can increase its membership at will. I have also shown that the council may increase the membership of that body, permanent or temporary, if it obtains the consent of the assembly. It is, therefore, perfectly manifest that the two bodies, cooperating even for one hour, can completely change the control of the proposed world government. The assembly can admit nations with whom we desire neither partnership nor cooperation. The council and a majority of the assembly acting in concert can add to the council as permanent members any number of nations they see fit. Indeed, there is no legal reason why representatives from all the nations of the world might not thus be made permanent members of the council. While that danger may not be great, there is great danger that the two bodies may in the future be willing to admit as members of the council, either permanent or temporary, nations highly objectionable to the people of the United States, if they were privileged to be consulted.

I call attention here to the fact that at no place save one are the people or the Government to be consulted. One man, one internationalist who happens to get on this board, can bind us in all these matters.

It should not go unnoticed that while the power to create permanent members exists, the power to oust or reject permanent members of the council necessarily can not exist.

It should not be overlooked that these radical changes in the membership of the governing bodies of the league can be effected without reference to any Government and without regard to the vote of any people on earth.

These governing bodies thus set up possess within themselves the immense power of procreation and extension by the exercise of which they can change the very nature and purpose of the league itself by changing the character of its membership.

The reply will, of course, be made that the United States can withdraw, but she can not withdraw without first giving two years' notice. Within that space of time the world may be overturned and our Republic destroyed.

Before leaving the question of the character of the inherent power of the governing bodies of the league, and especially the powers of the assembly in connection therewith, I want to call attention to the secretariat.

The secretariat—The assembly exercises a controlling influence over the executive branch of the government of the league.

The powers of the secretary general are not limited, as the name would seem to indicate, as the mere business recording officer. On the contrary, the secretariat is the executive arm of the government, possessing powers of the greatest importance. Very briefly I summarize these powers by quoting from the article:

The permanent secretariat shall be established at the seat of the league. The secretariat shall comprise a secretary general and such secretaries and staff as may be required.

The secretary general shall be appointed by the council with the approval of the majority of the assembly.

The secretaries and staff of the secretariat shall be appointed by the secretary general, with the approval of the council. (Art. 6.)

The language just quoted shows the power which may be exercised by the assembly. A simple majority of that body may refuse to concur in the unanimous selection of a council. It is a power which might easily be so exercised as to dictate the selection of a secretary general.

It is important in this connection to note the fact that the council and the assembly acting jointly have the absolute power of selection. That is to say, the executive is the creation of these two bodies. He has no independent source of authority. Here is found another marked distinction between the character of the world government and that of nearly every other government of the world, which generally recognizes the necessity of an executive owing his election to an independent source.

It is the closest and best-knit power trust ever conceived in the brain of man.

An examination of the peace treaty as well as the league covenant will show how important the control of the selection of the secretary general may be.

(a) He appoints the permanent staff; that is, permanent executive officers of the central government.

(b) He and his employees enjoy diplomatic privileges.

(c) The secretariat is, in fact, the executive arm and possesses powers of a very wide character. I can not at this time pause to discuss them. The point I now desire to emphasize is that he owes his election, in part, to the despised assembly, which is referred to as a mere "debating society."

Logical arrangement seems to require at this point a discussion of the sovereign powers possessed by the league. That arrangement I propose to temporarily disregard in order to impress, if possible, the great general jurisdiction vested in the assembly and its controlling power over the most important functions of the council.

THE ASSEMBLY POSSESSES A GENERAL JURISDICTION OVER ALL QUESTIONS AFFECTING THE PEACE OF THE WORLD.

A few quotations from the text of the covenant demonstrate the proposition just laid down:

The action of the league under this covenant shall be effected through the instrumentality of an assembly and of a council, with a permanent secretariat. (Art. 2.)

* * * The assembly shall meet at stated intervals and from time to time as occasion may require. * * *

The assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

At meetings of the assembly each member of the league shall have one vote. * * * (Art. 3.)

Here is a general all-embracing grant of jurisdiction and authority. It is unlimited by words of restriction. It is not said that "except as otherwise herein provided" "the assembly may deal with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world," but the statement is broad, general, and unlimited.

Bear in mind that this is the body in which every member of the league has representation, where all stand upon an exact equality, and where each is permitted to cast the same vote, saving and excepting, of course, the British Empire. That is to be excepted always.

Bear in mind, also, that we are pretending to be setting up a world democracy, a democracy of equity and equality.

I quote the President. When he wrote down his 14 points he declared:

A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small alike.

At Mount Vernon on July 4, 1918, he said:

There must be a settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, or economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned.

On September 27, 1918, he said:

* * * As representing this Government's interpretation of its own duty with regard to peace:

"First, the impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just. It must be a justice that plays no favorites and knows no standard but the equal rights of the several peoples concerned."

On Memorial Day at Arlington, May 30, 1916, he declared:

That small and weak States have as much right to their sovereignty and independence as large and strong States.

He still declares for these doctrines.

At Tacoma on September 13, 1919, he said:

We shall fight * * * for democracy * * * for the rights and liberties of small nations.

At St. Louis, on September 4, he said:

The essential object of that treaty is to establish the independence and protect the integrity of the weak peoples of the world.

If these weak peoples are to be brought into the league and permitted no voice or vote, and if the assembly is a "mere debating society," then how are they to be protected?

If the business of this league is to be conducted by the council, and these small States are excluded from the council, what becomes of world democracy except the vain sound of words that lose themselves in the emptiness of space, as they were empty of good faith when uttered, if we give it this construction?

If the assembly is a "mere debating society," then the power of the league must be lodged in the council, from the membership of which body the weaker nations are lawfully excluded. If such a view is to be entertained, then it is an oligarchy of nine nations controlling the world. Such has not been the view of the league which has heretofore been presented.

The league is to be, or was to be, a "parliament of men, a confederation of the world."

Bear in mind also that the assembly is the only body at the present time in which 23 of the member nations have any voice or vote. It is the only tribunal through which they can speak.

To claim, therefore, that the grant of power just quoted is materially restricted by other provisions of the league and that the power thus denied to the assembly is vested in the council is at the same time to deny the democracy and equality of the league. It is to assert that the league, instead of being a world democracy in which all member States have the right to deal with all questions concerning the peace of the world, is in fact a world autocracy, governed and controlled by nine nations.

I said that awhile ago, and I repeat it now. It ought to be repeated every morning, not in my poor words, but in the language of some man who could command the powers of our English.

To affirm that 23 nations are, as to all questions "affecting the peace of the world," made subject and vassal States, that they are controlled neither by their own interests nor guided by their own conceptions of justice, but that they must answer to the brutal lash of power wielded by the hands of nine international overlords, is to assert that the league is a great power machine erected upon the ruins of independent States.

Plainly, therefore, if we have regard for the pretended purposes of this league, the grant of authority to the assembly must be given not only its natural but its widest significance.

With this rule of construction, and no other rule is consistent with world democracy or national sanity, what questions are embraced in the words, "the assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world?"

You can not wrench these words from their plain meaning. The assembly can do anything the league as a whole can do. Its jurisdiction is as broad as the jurisdiction of the league. Every power granted to the league may be exercised by the assembly.

How broad are these powers thus granted to the league and to the assembly as its agent. It "may deal with any matter affecting the peace of the world." That embraces every international question, every problem of international law; boundary disputes; rights upon the seas; rights of nationals; rights of trade; construction of treaties; violations of territory. All are drawn within the sweeping terms of the provision. They are of the very essence of national sovereignty. When they are yielded by a State it has yielded the power of self-determination and granted the authority of life and death.

Additional proof that this construction is correct and was intended is found in the fact that there are but two governing bodies in the league—the assembly and the council—and the identical language employed with reference to the assembly in article 3 is employed word for word in article 4 with reference to the council. The two bodies are thus placed upon an exact equality. Each of them "may deal with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world."

Should any controversy affecting the peace of the world hereafter arise between the United States and any other country, and the assembly being in session should proceed to deal with that controversy, how could the United States, being a signatory of this agreement, challenge the jurisdiction of the assembly or repudiate the authority it had expressly granted?

That is a question I put to some of these gentlemen who are able to distinguish between moral and legal obligations of States and in matters of the world.

Now I am coming to an answer so complete to the contention of the President as to require a modification of his words. I am referring to his statement that upon all questions save the matter of election of membership the United States' one vote counts for as much as Great Britain's six, because we have an absolute veto power, and that therefore it makes no difference whether Great Britain has six votes or not; and we can sit down and indulge in the ecstasy of a sort of international dream, in which Great Britain appears in the character of a fool, with cap and bells, demanding six votes that count for nothing. This is the proposition that I lay down:

UPON MANY QUESTIONS OF VITAL IMPORTANCE THE ASSEMBLY CONSTITUTES A TRIBUNAL WITH POWER TO ANNUL, SET ASIDE, AND FOR NAUGHT HOLD THE UNANIMOUS DECISIONS OF THE COUNCIL. IT CAN COMPLETELY PARALYZE THE COUNCIL IN ITS MOST IMPORTANT FUNCTIONS. THIS MAY BE ACCOMPLISHED BY ANY 12 MEMBERS OF THE ASSEMBLY, 12 BEING A MAJORITY OF THE NON-COUNCIL MEMBERS OF THE ASSEMBLY.

The most important functions of the league, indeed, the functions which afford the most substantial arguments for its existence, are the provisions relating to the settlement of international disputes.

The machinery for the carrying out of these objects constitutes a curious and involved scheme which is set forth in articles 12, 13, 15, and 16. It will require some patience to straighten out the tangled skein. It is a very labyrinth of words. Nevertheless, the task is perhaps not impossible.

Article 12 contains two distinct provisions:

First. That all disputes likely to lead to rupture will be submitted for decision either to arbitration or to the council.

Second. That there shall be no resort to war until three months after the decision.

I quote:

The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council.

And they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council. * * * (Art. 12.)

It will be noticed that the provisions of article 12 seem to be limited to "any dispute likely to lead to rupture."

The provisions of article 13 are much broader. By its terms the members are made to agree "that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration, they will arbitrate the whole subject matter."

It is then expressly declared that—

(1) "Disputes as to the interpretation of treaties";

(2) "Disputes as to any question of international law";

(3) "Disputes as to the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of any international obligation";

(4) "Disputes as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach" of international obligations are declared to be "among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration."

The above language clearly includes every international question and dispute, including disputes involving the vital interests of the respective countries. Indeed it is difficult to conceive of any question which can arise between nations which is not embraced within the terms set forth. When we enter the league we therefore solemnly agree that all these questions are arbitral and we will submit them to either the decision of the board or court of arbitration or to the council of the league.

So far so good. Up to this point the tribunal of decision is either a court of arbitration or the council of the league; but article 15 qualifies and to a large extent nullifies all these provisions for submission to arbitration or to the council. This is accomplished by three provisions:

(1) By the provision which permits either party to insist in the first instance that the case shall not be decided by the court of arbitration but that it shall be sent to the council.

(2) By the provision which permits either party to remove the case from the council to the assembly.

(3) By the provision that the council may itself refer the dispute to the assembly for decision.

The language is:

If there should arise between the members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration as above (viz, as provided in articles 12 and 13), the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council.

Any party to the dispute may effect such submission by giving notice of the existence of the dispute to the secretary general, etc. (Art. 15.)

That carries it to the council.

The submission to the council is therefore an absolute right, and may be accomplished by either party filing a simple notice.

Thus the dispute is transferred from a tribunal of arbitration to the council.

The case being now in the council, it can be removed to the assembly by either one of two processes—

First. The council may upon its own motion transfer the dispute to the assembly for decision.

Second. Either party to the dispute may force such reference within 14 days after submission of the dispute to the council by simply making a request for transfer to the assembly.

The governing language of the section is:

The council may in any case under this article refer the dispute to the assembly.

The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided such request be made within 14 days after the submission of the dispute to the council. (Art. 15.)

I may weary you a little by repetition, but let me follow that through.

Following these provisions through, it is clear—

First. That there is an agreement to arbitrate or to refer to the council.

Second. Either party may send the case to the council by a simple notice.

Third. Upon request of either party the case must be removed to the assembly for decision.

In the last analysis, therefore, the disputes mentioned in these important articles need not be, and probably will not be, decided by a board or court of arbitrators. Neither will they be decided by the council. The assembly will, by every probability, be the final and authoritative body which will render the decision.

Thus, I have shown that all the great international disputes covered by articles 12, 13, and 15 may be sent, by the simplest of processes, to the assembly for final determination.

It follows that in all disputes likely to provoke serious international difficulties or produce war one or the other of the parties will appeal to the assembly.

The result pointed out is bound to occur, because one or the other of the parties will naturally find its antagonist to have a natural advantage in the council. Upon discovering that fact, the nation disadvantaged will, of course, carry its case into the assembly, unless, indeed, it may know that body to be similarly prejudiced. To assume that any other course of conduct will be followed is to assert the incompetency of the contenders.

It is now important to inquire what is the effect of the removal of a dispute from the council to the assembly. A careful study of the document will show that—

THE POWER OF THE LEAGUE TO FORCE THE SETTLEMENT OF INTERNATIONAL DISPUTES BY THE UNANIMOUS DECISIONS OF THE COUNCIL MAY BE COMPLETELY NULLIFIED BY ANY 12 NON-COUNCIL MEMBERS OF THE ASSEMBLY REFUSING TO CONCUR IN THE UNANIMOUS DECISION OF THE MEMBERS OF THE COUNCIL.

To understand the above proposition it is necessary to call attention to the fact that it is provided—

If the report by the council (upon disputes arising under sections 12, 13, and 14) is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report. (Art. 15.)

The thing that everybody who is for this league desires is that it shall make unanimous that the right to go to war shall cease.

But if the report is not unanimous, then the right is reserved to any State to go to war if it sees fit. The language is:

If the council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice. (Art. 15.)

Clearly, therefore, a unanimous decision by the council is of the utmost importance in order that war may be prevented, for if there is not such decision, the nations may immediately go to war, or at least at the end of three months.

Yet with the situation just described staring us in the face, we find the provision for the removal of the dispute to the assembly.

Now we have the dispute before the assembly, and it comes there upon the request of either party, to state the whole matter briefly.

When the controversy goes to the assembly in order that its decision may have the effect of a unanimous decision of the council, the unanimous vote of those members of the assembly who are members of the council—barring the disputants—must be secured, and also a majority of the noncouncil members of the assembly. If that majority is not secured, then the case stands as it would if it had remained in the council and that body had failed to unanimously agree. The governing language is:

In any case referred to the assembly all the provisions of this article and of article 12 relating to action and powers of the council shall apply to the action and powers of the assembly, provided that the report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force and effect as a report by the council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the representative of one or more of the parties. (Art. 15.)

In the absence of a majority vote by the noncouncil members of the assembly the case then is in exactly the same condition as it would have been had it remained in the council and that body had failed to reach a unanimous decision. What then would be the situation?

It is, as I have already said, governed by the language:

If the council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league reserve to themselves the right to take any such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice. (Art. 13.)

That is to say, in the absence of a unanimous decision any nation is at liberty to go to war to enforce its claims or demands. It may "take such action as it shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice."

Of course, every nation going to war claims to be going to maintain right and justice.

The absence of a unanimous decision by the council gives to each State, or leaves to each State, the right to decide the question for itself. All that is necessary, therefore, in order to authorize a State to go to war is that it shall secure a disagreement in the council, or if it can not secure a disagreement in the council, it may remove the case to the assembly. If it there can secure a majority of the noncouncil members, it is privileged to ravage the earth at will, the league of nations and the dream of world peace to the contrary notwithstanding.

The assembly being thus vested with the tremendous power by refusing concurrence in a unanimous decision of the council to deluge the world with war or by concurring to set in motion the alleged vast coercive machinery of the league—as is claimed—to preserve the peace of the world, is nevertheless referred to sneeringly by Senators and by the distinguished world advocate of the league as a mere international debating society.

If it be a mere debating society, then it is the most worthless machinery ever conceived in the brain of man, asleep or awake, thinking or dreaming.

THE POWER OF FINAL DECISION RESERVED TO THE ASSEMBLY GIVES TO THE BRITISH EMPIRE A DANGEROUS, IF NOT A DOMINATING, CONTROL OF THE LEAGUE, AND WILL ENABLE IT IN CASE THE COUNCIL SHOULD EVER BE PREPARED TO RENDER A DECISION AGAINST IT TO NULLIFY THE ACTION OF THE COUNCIL.

A simple illustration will serve to point the accuracy of the statement just made.

Assume that the United States has a dispute with the British Empire. The Empire refuses to arbitrate and the case goes to the council. Great Britain learns that all the members of the council not parties to the dispute are of the unanimous opinion that the contention of the United States is just. Thereupon Great Britain gives notice and the case is transferred to the assembly. The case comes on for decision. The seven members of the assembly—who are also members of the council and not parties to the controversy—namely, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Greece, Spain, and Brazil, all vote in favor of the United States. This leaves 23 members of the assembly who are not members of the council. Unless a majority of these members—to wit, 12—vote to concur with the members of the council, then the decision stands exactly as a decision of the council would stand which was not concurred in by all the members of the council. That is to say, the decision will have no binding force or effect whatever.

Great Britain can escape the effect of a unanimous decision provided 12 of the 23 noncouncil members of the assembly vote with her.

Accordingly the roll of the members of the assembly who are not members of the council is called. Upon this roll are found the following countries: Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India.

It needs no argument to prove that England starts with 5 of the necessary 12 votes in her pocket.

Neither does it require argument to show that Hedjaz, whose King is in the pay of the British Empire, will give an additional vote.

Likewise, it is certain that the vote of Siam would be similarly controlled.

This would give Great Britain 7 of the 12 votes necessary to block the effect of the unanimous decision of the council in favor of the United States. Thus she only needs 5 more votes.

Can any candid man looking over the list of member States doubt that British diplomacy and British gold and British power would secure the 5 necessary votes?

Consider, in this connection, Liberia, Haiti, and other semi-barbarous States, in some of which the governments are mere temporary military dictatorships established by first one revolutionist and then another, each seeking the office of ruler that he may loot the treasury and levy blackmail upon business.

Great Britain has an additional certain vote as soon as Persia joins, for she already holds that country in the hollow of her hand.

She can create others at any time by employing her six votes and her influence in the assembly to elect other British colonies and subject states as members.

At this point we will be met by this contention:

That the colonies and dependencies of the British Empire are constituent parts of the Empire, and therefore can not vote on any controversy to which the Empire is a party.

That is a good place to stop and stick a pin. When the President said we would always have a veto power, that our one vote would protect us in every controversy, he forgot that in every controversy where our life is at stake, where we are on trial, we have no voice and no vote, but alien states decide our fate and settle our right to live. That evokes a smile of pleasure and satisfaction from the distinguished leader of the league forces. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

If it were true, and it is not, as I shall show, that the colonies and dependencies of Great Britain can not vote in any controversy to which the British Empire is a party, still the fact would remain that in all other world questions coming before the assembly the empire would command six times the voting power of the United States.

Innumerable instances might arise where the British Empire was not a party and yet her interests be opposed both to the wishes and interests of the United States. In all such cases the predominance of her votes might be decisive and might give her a material advantage, to our great injury.

But is it true that the dominions and colonies are barred from a vote in cases where Great Britain is a party? I affirm—

First. THAT CANADA, AUSTRALIA, SOUTH AFRICA, NEW ZEALAND, AND INDIA ARE RECEIVED INTO THE LEAGUE AS INDEPENDENT POWERS AND THAT THEY ARE ENTITLED TO ALL THE RIGHTS OF ANY OTHER MEMBER, EXCEPT THAT THEY ARE NOT PRESENTLY NAMED AS MEMBERS OF THE COUNCIL.

Second. THAT THESE DOMINIONS AND COLONIES ARE, UPON ELECTION BY THE ASSEMBLY, QUALIFIED TO TAKE SEATS IN THE COUNCIL, THEIR RIGHT IN THAT RESPECT BEING—SAVE THE FIVE PERMANENT MEMBERS—EXACTLY THE SAME AS THE RIGHT OF ANY OTHER STATE, HOWEVER GREAT.

Third. IN ANY SUCH ELECTION BY THE ASSEMBLY THESE DOMINIONS AND COLONIES CAN AS MEMBERS OF THAT BODY CAST THEIR UNITED VOTES IN SUPPORT OF ANY ONE OR MORE OF THEIR NUMBER OR IN FAVOR OF ANY OTHER CANDIDATE FOR THE COUNCIL WHO MAY BE SUBSERVIENT TO BRITISH INTERESTS.

I am aware that these views have been challenged—indeed, they have been controverted—by the President. Permit me, therefore, to submit the proof:

(a) Article 1 reads: "The original members of the league of nations shall be those of the signatories named in the annex."

Among the signatories are to be found not only the British Empire, but also Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India, and the Union of South Africa, each of the latter signing exactly as the United States and other great nations.

To treat them as anything but full members is to deny the plain language of the instrument.

(b) Article 1 further provides:

Any fully self-governing State, dominion, or colony may become a member—

And so forth.

It does not say may become "a part of a member" or may become "a member some of the time." It declares that all "fully self-governing States, dominions, and colonies" may become members. "Self-governing States, dominions, and colonies" are all grouped together. The single requirement for membership is an election by the assembly.

(c) The representatives of the Dominion of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India, and the Union of South Africa all actually sat on the peace council and took part in its proceedings as fully as any nation, except the five great powers, which, of course, dominated. Frequently, indeed, only three of the great powers sat to determine certain questions.

It may be remarked in passing that the Dominion of Canada took a more active part in the peace negotiations than many of the great nations, two Canadians sitting as representatives of the Dominion in the peace negotiations, while one of the three sat as the representative of the British Empire.

(d) All of these dominions and colonies were represented by ministers, who signed for their respective Governments, although Lloyd-George et al. had already appeared and signed, describing themselves as the representatives of "His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British dominions beyond the seas, Emperor of India." These respective states appeared and signed by their duly accredited agents.

It is recited of those signing as follows:

WHO having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have AGREED AS FOLLOWS:

Then follows the peace treaty.

(e) These "self-governing dominions and colonies" were not only parties to the making of the treaty, represented by their duly authenticated agents, but the treaty itself has been submitted, or is in process of being submitted, for approval to the respective parliaments of these "self-governing dominions and colonies."

Within the past 30 days, after full consideration of the treaty, the Canadian Parliament solemnly approved the document.

All this seems to make a pretty conclusive showing of the question I am discussing, which is the full and complete membership of the British dominions and colonies.

Upon this point I present the further evidence that such is the construction of the British press and of the Canadian Government itself.

When the clause "any fully self-governing state, dominion, or colony may become a member" was written into the treaty, the London Times declared that as "the dominions are in this document recognized as nations before the world is a fact of profound significance in the history of these relations."

At about the same time British publicists declared the recognition of dominions and colonies of Great Britain as the equal of great States to be the finest triumph of British statesmanship in 200 years.

On September 3 Sir Robert Borden, Premier of Canada, in addressing the Canadian Parliament declared, in answering the inquiry, "What are the powers and what is the standing of Canada in the league?"—

The new and definite status of the dominions at the peace conference is further manifested in the constitution of the league of nations. Since they had enjoyed the same status at the peace conference as that of minor powers, we took the ground that the dominions should be similarly accepted in the future international relationship contemplated by the league. The league of nations commission, while inclined to accept this in principle, did not at the outset accept all its implications, as was apparent in the first draft of the covenant. This document, however, was professedly tentative. The dominions' case was pressed, and in the final form, as amended and incorporated in the treaty of peace with Germany, the status of the dominions as to membership and representation in the assembly and the council was fully recognized. They are to become members signatory of the treaty, and the terms of the document make no distinction between them and other signatory members—

Now, get this, for I am coming back to it—

An official statement as to the true intent and meaning of the provisions of the covenant in that regard was secured by me and is on record in the archives of the peace conference.

The British premier goes on to state that a similar question arose in respect to the constitution of the international labor organization and in substance declares that the representatives of the dominions and colonies forced its revision so as to recognize their status in that organization as it had been recognized in the league covenant. He then declared:

I hope the House will realize that the recognition and status accorded to the British dominions at the peace conference were not won without constant effort and firm insistence. In all these efforts the dominions had the strong and unwavering support of the British prime minister and his colleagues.

Further on he discusses the future of the British Empire, and in substance declares that the colonies are to be recognized as nations in their dealings with the British Empire itself, held together, however, by what he says is a British league of nations.

Referring back to the statement just quoted, I call attention to the clause in the statement of Sir Robert Borden—

An official statement as to the true intent and meaning of the provisions of the covenant in that regard (the status as to membership of the dominions and colonies) was secured by me and is on record in the archives of the peace conference.

That official statement filed in the archives of the peace conference was undoubtedly disclosed in the House of Commons of Canada on September 9 by Hon. Arthur Lewis Sifton, minister of public works, and one of the representatives of Canada at the Versailles conference, and one of the plenipotentiaries who signed the treaty for the Dominion.

After concurring generally in the statement made by Sir Robert Borden as to the struggles of the Dominion's statesmen to secure the full right to take part in the peace conference, he said:

And, undoubtedly, they did work—

The Canadian representatives—*in conjunction with the permanent officials of the British Government * * * for the purpose of assisting in the formation of the treaty that would be of great advantage to Great Britain, to the advantage of the British Empire; and, as far as possible, a fair and honorable treaty for the world at large.*

That is the British view. It is a photograph of the British soul. I do not say that with unkindness for Great Britain; she is not a monster, but she is a great power that first secures great advantage to herself and then, as far as possible, a fair and honorable treaty for the other fellow.

I continue reading; I should not have broken the thread of my discourse. I read on:

That work—

That is, the work of securing this recognition—was performed in connection with what I may call the peace treaty proper.

I continue reading:

The leader of the opposition contends that we can not take any part in the league of nations.

The President of the United States contends that they can not take any part in the league of nations; that they are only members of the council; that they have not any authority; that they are just admitted to a debating society. Let us see what these Canadians say:

The leader of the opposition contends that we can not take any part in the league of nations. Let me say that Clemenceau, President Wilson, and Lloyd-George disagreed absolutely with the honorable gentleman in that contention.

IN PROOF OF THIS HE SUBMITTED THE FOLLOWING LETTER SIGNED BY CLEMENCEAU, WILSON, and GEORGE:

The question having been raised as to the meaning of article 4 of the league of nations covenant, we have been requested by Sir Robert Borden to state whether we concur in his view that upon the true construction of the first and second paragraphs of that article representatives of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire may be selected or named as members of the council. We have no hesitation in expressing our entire concurrence in this view. If there were any doubt it would be entirely removed by the fact that the articles are not subject to a narrow or technical construction.

(Signed) G. CLEMENCEAU.
WOODROW WILSON.
D. LLOYD-GEORGE.

Dated at the Quai D'Orsay, Paris, the 6th day of May, 1919.

A debating society! [Laughter.] On the 6th day of May this letter was written. On the 19th day of September this body had so transformed itself that it had become a mere debating society in which votes are of no consequence, whether they are six or whether they are one!

Oh, memory, memory! How quick your footprints fade, and on the sands of time how futile it is to write the record of the years!

In view of this letter, which solemnly assures the Canadian statesman that the dominions were so fully recognized as members that their representatives were eligible to seats on the council, although the British Empire was already made a permanent member of that body, it would seem that argument ought to cease, and that any contention that the self-governing dominions and colonies are not received as separate and independent entities with the full right of membership as independent States in every case, ought to be no longer heard.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator if I should ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. I yield; certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I have listened to the reading of that letter signed by M. Clemenceau and by Lloyd-George and by the President. As I understand it, they declare that one of the self-governing dominions or colonies is eligible to a seat in the council.

Mr. REED. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LODGE. Which is the highest function.

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. But the distinction the President draws, as I understand it—the Senator will correct me if I am wrong—is that though they are eligible for the council they can not vote in the league. Is that about it?

Mr. REED. That seems to be it. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator suspend a moment? The Chair has a duty to perform, imposed upon him by the rules. He does not intend to interfere unduly, but he gives the galleries notice now that if there is further interruption in the course of the speech the Chair will regard it as his duty to clear the galleries.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hope the Chair will not be too hard upon the occupants of the galleries. It is the only chance the American people are having to express their opinion nowadays, although I am not criticizing the Chair—the Chair is absolutely right—and I am not seeking to have the galleries applaud. The Chair is right. We ought to observe the rule all the time. We have not observed it for about six or seven weeks. It is a good time to begin now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair be fully understood.

Mr. REED. I fully understand the Chair. The Chair is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is endeavoring to follow the custom adopted by the honored permanent occupant of the chair, and he does not intend to clear the galleries because there may be applause at the close of the speech of the Senator from Missouri [laughter]; but he can not permit the continuous interruption of the speech by expressions of approval or disapproval.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I congratulate the President pro tempore. He has drawn a distinction almost as fine as that between moral and legal obligations. [Laughter.] Anyway, we get out from under the rule, and disregard it.

THE PRESIDENT'S CONTENTION.

The President insists that the fact that the British Empire has six votes and the United States but one is utterly immaterial.

In his speech at Spokane on September 15, he said:

There is another matter * * * that this covenant was an arrangement for the dominance of Great Britain. They base that upon the fact that in the assembly of the council six units of the British Empire are represented, whereas the United States is represented as only one unit. Alike in the assembly and the council, the vote of the United States is an absolute veto. We can always veto, always offset, with one vote the British six votes. I must say that I look with perfect philosophy upon the difference in number. (Quoted from the Washington Post, Sept. 13, 1919.)

On September 18 at San Francisco, in a written answer to questions propounded by a San Francisco league of nations organization, the President said:

But it is not true that the British Empire can outvote us in the league of nations and therefore control the action of the league, because in every matter except the admission of new members in the league no action can be taken without the concurrence of a unanimous vote of the representatives of the States which are members of the council, so that in all matters of action the affirmative vote of the United States is necessary and equivalent to the united vote of the representatives of the several parts of the British Empire. The united vote of the several parts of the British Empire can not offset or overcome the vote of the United States.

If it be true that the United States can always with its one vote offset the six votes of the British Empire, then it is equally true that with one vote the United States can offset the vote of the other 31 members of the league; for if six times one is one, or the equivalent of one, by the same kind of mathematics it is the equivalent of thirty-one.

The President's view is, however—and I want to state it fairly—that except upon the single question of the admission of new States the single vote of the United States can bar any action whatsoever by either the council or the assembly, because he holds that it requires unanimous action.

It grieves me to be compelled to differ from the President, but with all due respect I must insist that the President's statement is erroneous to the last degree. He utterly overlooks many controlling clauses of the agreement which he is now asking the American people to accept without proper time for debate or consideration. He disregards three important facts:

(1) That when the United States is a party in interest it is denied the right to vote at all. If the case is before the council, it is determined by the members of that body not concerned in the dispute.

(2) If the case in which the United States is interested is removed to the assembly, again the United States, as a party in interest, is barred from voting, but the British Empire has six votes in the assembly which it can cast either to create the necessary majority of the noncouncil members of the assembly, which, concurring with the decision of the members of the assembly, who are members of the council, will give to the decision of the assembly the full force and effect of a unanimous decision of the council. Upon the contrary, it could cast those votes in the opposite direction; but that is not material at this moment.

(3) In a controversy between the United States and Great Britain, where neither is permitted to sit in judgment, the five colonies and dominions are, as I have shown, and I think conclusively, as independent, self-governing bodies, permitted to cast their votes, and may either form the necessary concurring majority to make the unanimous decision in favor of Great Britain or they may be employed to destroy that majority, and thus deprive the United States of the effect of a unanimous decision.

All this I have sought to elaborate and demonstrate in the remarks heretofore made. I have already shown that the ability to command 12 votes out of the 23 noncouncil members of the assembly is the power to either give to a decision by the assembly the effect of a unanimous decision of the council or to render such decision utterly nugatory.

These facts are not to be passed by lightly. They can not be disposed of by flowers of rhetoric or obscured by generalization although couched in the most delicate diction.

What are the controversies which are to be thrown in the assembly and on which, being a party to the dispute, we can not sit and therefore can not cast the one precious vote which would negative, according to the President, all other efforts, and to which the President so impressively refers?

The controversies are "any dispute likely to lead to a rupture" (Art. 12) between the United States and any other country; all—

Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach. * * * (Art. 13.)

These questions, which cover the whole range of our possible international disputes and involve questions vital to our interests, may be forced before the assembly for decision.

Again, I repeat, when we are parties disputant we do not sit. We have neither voice nor vote in the decision. We are on trial. We are parties litigant, if indeed we are not haled before the tribunal like a prisoner brought to the bar of a criminal court. We therefore do not sit in judgment. We are not qualified for membership on the jury where our single negative vote might count.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I simply wish to inquire of the Senator what difference there would be in the position of the United States whether it had one vote or six in the contingency to which the Senator has just referred? Would the privilege of having six votes avail the United States any more than the one vote?

Mr. REED. If the United States had six votes she would be barred with her six votes, and she could not sit, and she could not count them; but her great antagonist—not in that controversy perhaps, but in a thousand others, and perhaps directly interested, but not on the surface—Great Britain, sits here on the jury and has six members of that jury. That is the side of the case that the Senator from New Mexico and other Senators can not see. When you give a nation six times the votes we have in every single controversy we have, where we are not in conflict with her, she has six times the power in the league that we possess.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just a moment. As I have shown, and I think conclusively, if our controversy was with Great Britain the British Empire could not sit, but her five colonies could sit.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Assuming a case which was not one of dispute between the United States and Great Britain, but to which the United States and some other country would be the parties, does the Senator believe that the United States would be prejudiced from the fact that England and her colonies together had six votes? Does the Senator feel that the colonies of Great Britain would be any more apt to decide against the United States than any of the other nations parties to this league?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that would just simply depend on the question. I start with the proposition that Great Britain now, as in the past, and in the future as in the past, is going to look out for British interests, and if a question arose between the United States and Italy in which the British Empire had a particular interest, the British Empire and her six votes would be cast solidly.

Now, let me give you a case out of my mind, although a man ought not to attempt a thing of this kind while he is on his feet. Let us assume the United States has a controversy with Belgium. We might as well talk plainly. Belgium only exists, and only has existed, because she is sustained by Great Britain. That is the reason, or one of the reasons, that Great Britain so quickly went to war in defense of Belgium, because she was a buffer State, put there to protect the British Channel. Let us assume that we get into a controversy with Belgium, and that that controversy with Belgium is of such a nature that its decision one way or the other will affect the interests of the British Empire in sustaining that State in a particular condition. I would not blame Great Britain, sitting in this political tribunal, that has not one of the attributes of a court of justice, if she voted in her own interest, as I know we would vote in our own interest if we had a man there fit to represent us.

I must proceed. I will give you an illustration. The controversy is with Japan. That country, like our own, is barred from voting. The case proceeds to judgment. The seven members of the council, sitting as members of the assembly, are closely attached to Japan, or to Great Britain, the friend and ally of Japan; the seven members of the council sitting with the assembly vote against us; but our case is not yet lost if we can secure the majority of the 23 members of the assembly who are not members of the council. Then we save a unanimous decision against us, and the question is open for us to take such action as we see fit.

But when the roll is called 12 of the 23 votes are cast against us and we learn to our dismay that 5 of these votes were cast by British dominions and colonies, following the lead and answering to the dictates of the Imperial Government. We also learn that the representative of Hedjaz, in the pay of Great Britain, has cast another of the 12 fatal votes, and that Siam, a vassal and corrupt State controlled by British influence, has added another fatal vote. We turn in dismay from the scene, when we hear called the names of Liberia, Haiti, and the other semibarbarous and venal States. Surely it can not be claimed that we can offset Great Britain's six votes with our single vote, for in that case we are not permitted to vote at all.

Let us go back to that illustration a minute. Mark you, the British Empire, as a member of the council, one of the permanent members, wants to decide against us, and has voted that way. The seven members of the council who are not members of the controversy between us and Japan have voted against us. Our only means of escape is to secure 12 of the 23 noncouncil members of the assembly, and 5 of those are Britishers. Will they not follow the lead of the parent States, and the vote already cast? Is that any advantage to Great Britain? Might it be a disadvantage to us?

That controversy, sir, if you please, is over the question of racial equality, the right of Japan to have her citizens land in California and enjoy the same privileges as the children of the native-born whites of that State. But when that controversy comes up, we find Great Britain, that made a secret treaty with Japan to rob China while China stood at her side, and kept that treaty a secret, from our President, at least, even while we were preparing for this war and winnig it—we find Great Britain now allied with Japan on this race question. Will it, sir, be of any disadvantage to us if she has six more votes in the assembly? The argument that it is not is an argument that is beneath the level of contempt, and does not warrant our reply.

There are some things fine phrases can not do. All the fine phrases that ever were coined in the brain of a phrase maker never changed a fact of life.

I now return to my text. If it be argued that the picture is dark, I answer that every page of history is black with similar pictures of selfishness, perfidy, and double-dealing. When the President was talking about his 14 points and the establishment of international justice Great Britain and Japan were secretly plotting the dismemberment of China. When Chinese laborers were expiring in the trenches beneath the blast of German artillery in the cause of the Allies their fatherland was being parceled out by their associates in the war and their sacred cities surrendered to their great rival and antagonist.

At the very time the President insisted that our soldiers were going over the trenches inspired by visions of world justice and dreaming the dream that the day of eternal equity had dawned, while, when they were dying beside British soldiers in the cause of Great Britain, British statesmen were concealing from the President the abominable and cruel treaties with Japan and Italy wrought out in the secret plottings and conspiracies of their diplomats.

Let a question ever arise in which the interests of Great Britain are strongly opposed to those of the United States, the six votes of Great Britain can be cast to our detriment or destruction, whilst we, sitting at the bar of a packed court, are denied the privilege of casting even one vote.

Now I want to summarize the powers of the assembly, this despised debating society. I can not allude to that thing without pointing to the arrant hypocrisy, I almost said knavery, of inviting nations of the world into an organization, sovereign nations, as equals, telling them they have a membership in one of those bodies, and then saying to them, "While you have a membership it does not amount to anything. You are mere children, fools, things that have been trifled with." And yet we proclaim that this is a great world democracy. If, sir, it be true that they have drawn 32 of the nations of the world into this league, and if they came believing in the doctrine of world democracy, and if having come in they have no power to vote in the assembly, no power that amounts to anything, if they are stripped of everything except the obligations of membership, then, instead of this being a world democracy, a temple of equality, it is a pitfall to which they have been lured, and instead of it being a great tribunal of justice it is a tribunal of power, where the mastership of the world is brought within the hands of four or five men, where three or four or five men can meet, as they have recently met over in Europe, and determine to send the armies of this country to fight and die in other lands.

The morning paper tells us that they have ordered the United States marines into Fiume. Will they fight, or is it a mere attempt to coerce Italian patriots into a surrender of a land they believe is theirs? Shall our strength be employed brutally to crush; and if so, at whose command? Is it the three or four men sitting in secret council 3,000 miles from the United States who order these troops into action? Beware ere you surrender the control of your own Government.

Now, I want to summarize the powers of this assembly.

THE POWERS OF THE ASSEMBLY SUMMARIZED.

Briefly let us summarize the powers of the assembly and the votes by which it acts.

(1) By a two-thirds vote the assembly can increase its own membership. It may so exercise this power as to admit every self-governing country, dominion, or colony, regardless of its size or the state of its civilization.

(2) The assembly can specify the guaranties which must be given by new members and dictate the strength of their military, naval, and air forces.

(3) The assembly by one-third vote, plus one vote, can exclude from membership any of the great European countries not named in the protocol. These countries embrace in the aggregate more than one-half of the white people of the world. By the exercise of the authority of exclusion, it may force the nations excluded into the organization of a rival league which would certainly result in a great conflagration. Upon the other hand, it might admit those with whom we have no desire for partnership or other intimate relations.

(4) The assembly can deny a member the right to withdraw by deciding it has not fulfilled all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant. The decision probably has to be arrived at by a unanimous vote; but the trouble is the unanimous vote must be secured by the assembly, and a single vote can probably bar a nation from withdrawing.

(5) The assembly has the power in its discretion at any time to supplant four of the nine members of the council and to elect others in their stead. This can probably be done by a majority vote.

(6) The assembly by a majority vote can prevent the council from creating additional permanent members of the council even though the council should unanimously vote for such increase.

(7) The assembly by a majority vote can prevent the council from creating additional general members of the council even though the council should unanimously vote for such increase.

(8) The assembly can by a majority vote prevent the council from appointing the secretary general, whom it has chosen by a unanimous vote.

(9) Most important of all is the fact that the assembly is the court of final resort in—

(a) All disputes between members likely to lead to rupture.

(b) Disputes as to the interpretation of treaties.

(c) Disputes as to any question of international law.

(d) Disputes as to the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of any international obligation.

(e) Disputes as to the nature and extent of the reparation to be made for any such breach of international obligation.

The above embrace substantially every conceivable international question, including those involving the vital interests of the country.

In none of these disputes is the United States permitted to sit or vote if it is a party to the dispute.

In all of them the unanimous vote of the members of the council may be nullified by the vote (as the league is now organized) of 12 noncouncil members of the assembly.

(10) The assembly possesses a general jurisdiction over "all matters within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world."

The grant of jurisdiction and authority is unlimited. Whether in such case the league must proceed by unanimous vote to make a decision binding or whether it acts by majority may be in doubt; if a majority vote is sufficient, then the powers of the league for affirmative action are tremendous and practically unlimited.

If a unanimous vote is required, then the single vote of any country could bar a unanimous decision and the case would stand, as would a case pending before the council in which that body failed to arrive at unanimous decision. That is to say, the contending nation would be at liberty to immediately go to war. There seems to be no reason why the assembly might not in all cases assert its jurisdiction with the result above indicated.

To argue that an organization possessing these great and fundamental powers is a mere "debating society" is to talk in the teeth of the fact.

IF THE LEAGUE IS CAPABLE OF PRESERVING THE PEACE OF THE WORLD, THEN IT MUST HAVE IMMENSE POWERS.

The assembly possesses the great basic controlling and creative powers to which I have adverted. It is to the league substantially what the stockholders of a corporation are to the body corporate. They can control its policy by electing its board of directors and by asserting the fundamental rights inherent in them as stockholders. To these rights I have elsewhere called attention.

THE LEAGUE.

Its unlimited world jurisdiction.

IN THE AGGREGATE THE LEAGUE IS GRANTED THE POWER TO CONTROL THE WORLD IN ALL INTERNATIONAL MATTERS AND IN ALL DOMESTIC MATTERS AFFECTING THE PEACE OF THE WORLD.

I come now to a discussion of the powers of the league in the aggregate, regardless of whether the particular powers are vested in the assembly or council. At the risk of repetition, I call attention again to the language of the covenant:

The assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world. (Art. 3.)

Notice the next:

The council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world. (Art. 4.)

Identical, word for word, except that the word "council" is submitted for "assembly."

Now listen, you who talk about debating societies——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have been very much interested in what the Senator has been pleased to term the general powers of the league. I will ask the Senator, suppose the covenant had provided that the Senator from Missouri might on any occasion deal with any subject affecting the peace of the world. What effect would that have in the control of the United States?

Mr. REED. I do not know why the Senator asks a question like that. If it has any bearing whatever on the case, I do not get it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. With the Senator's permission, I will make the illustration a little plainer.

Mr. REED. If you will say that the Senator from Missouri sits as a member of the body and that that body can deal with any question that affects the peace of the world, and then if you will give him six votes like Great Britain, and the other nations one vote, I will show you what the Senator from Missouri will do. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am willing to assume that the Senator from Missouri has all the votes.

Mr. REED. All right.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Assuming that he has all the votes of the assembly and could cast them as he sees fit, I should like to inquire of the Senator how, through those votes, he could affect the sovereignty of the United States or affect the interests of the United States so far as controlling its action is concerned?

Mr. REED. My dear sir, because we have specifically agreed when we entered this league that substantially every international question that may ever arise between us and any other power shall be decided by this league, and when we surrender to a body of foreign gentlemen the right to say what the United States shall do or shall not do in great questions affecting its life, its death, we surrender its sovereignty to that tribunal, and I think if we do this we graze the edge of treason.

I have read these two clauses and I have hitherto commented on the all-embracing jurisdiction conferred upon the league. That does not mean anything, according to the Senator from New Mexico, and according to all the advocates of the league. We have driven you to a point where your only plea is impotency, powerlessness; but you forget that when you plead that you lack power, you plead that you are still-born.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not care to take the Senator's name, but we do not plead impotency. What we do plead for is that in the forum of the world discussion and conference and counsel will have a very potent effect in settling the world's questions, and while we contend that the assembly has no army and no navy and no police force, yet in the same way that the Pan American Union or The Hague conferences have influenced the world there will come great benefit to the world through this assembly, although it has neither army nor navy.

Mr. REED. In other words, we are going to meet and talk it over. In other words, this body that is to control the passions of the world and that is given this broad and general and sweeping jurisdiction can not do anything but meet and talk it over. Who can do it? What tribunal or what body of men have the power?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. None, unless the governments, through their representatives in this league, should choose to exert power.

Mr. REED. Are you willing to put in that it is to be nothing but a debating society? If so, we can end this right now. You can not stand here in one moment claiming that you have a power great enough to control the world and all of its evil passions and in the next moment, when you are driven to the wall and demonstration is made that that power may destroy our Republic, you can not turn around and say it is only a debating society, it has not any power. There ought to be some good faith about this matter.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. REED. If this thing has no power let us write it in the face of the instrument that it has no power. Let us quit haggling about words.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will ask the Senator to point out what power it does have.

Mr. REED. I have been pointing it out for three hours. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I use the word "power" in the sense of force.

Mr. REED. Let us see. Are we going to have some more quibbling? Are we going to say this thing is not a thing of power because it itself does not have an army and a navy, but it is a thing of power because its ipse dixit will set the armies and navies of the world in motion? If that is the dodge we are to have—and I do not apply it to the Senator, of course—there never was a shyster who stood before a jury in a justice court that had the impudence to make that sort of a plea. It has to be either something or nothing. It does not make any difference, sir, whether I myself am going by my own will to start 5,000,000 men marching across the earth armed to the teeth by my own direct command or whether I can by a recommendation send the same 5,000,000 men forth with poisoned gas and death in other forms.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. May I ask the Senator if the recommendation results in that, does it not mean that the recommendation carries such a spirit of fairness and bears a proposition which is so vital to the peace of the world at that time, that all these nations will accept that recommendation and act upon it?

Mr. REED. No, no. Let me show you why. I am surprised that that question should have been asked. It means only that the recommendation shall have force in so far as the nations want to obey it. Who might want to obey it? Germany's monarch concluded he wanted a world war, and he exercised the kind of influence about which the Senator is talking. He did not command the other nations to come forward, but he just intimated to his brother of Austria and his brother of Turkey and his brother-in-law of some other place that now was a good time to loot the world and clean it up generally, and so it appealed so much to their conscience that they immediately fell in line, just as the Senator's illustration points out.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Does the Senator expect the United States to fall into line under such circumstances?

Mr. REED. I do not know whether they would or not; there have been so many foolish things done. But they might fall into line to crush us, sir. The trouble with you gentlemen who want to overturn the world is that you set up a proposition of a great power and you forget it is only going to be for our benefit; you forget it may be used for our assassination. You assume that it is going to be marshaled under the banner of Almighty God, commanded only by archangels, seeking alone the good of mankind. You forget that it will be marshaled under the banners of great nations, bent upon doing exactly what England is doing now—grabbing the world—and we may be the victims of it.

But I say further than that, when the decision is rendered we are bound to respond. Have we still got to stand here and discuss that question? The United States agrees to defend the frontiers of every member of the league against attack; and, having made that agreement, are we still sitting here to argue we do not have to keep it; that we have the power to violate it, and, therefore, it amounts to nothing? I thought those who had uttered that sentiment had grown ashamed of it. To argue that the United States binds herself to abide by the decision of these tribunals, and then to say, "Oh, but we do not have to keep it; Congress can refuse to keep it in the future," is to say that the United States will break her word, regard her treaties as scraps of paper, write dishonor upon her brow, brand her soul as that of a faith breaker, and place us in the catalogue of the most despised people of the world.

So far as I am concerned, sir, if we ratify this treaty and agree to protect the frontiers of every member of the league and China shall attack Japan to get back Shantung, I will be compelled to vote, and you will all be compelled to vote, to send an army to Japan to defend against China. I will not sit here saying that I voted to ratify the treaty with a lie on my lips, with perfidy in my heart, with a contemptible purpose to break the treaty whenever I want to, for if I so act I shall brand myself as unworthy a seat at the council table of the world. The United States will not do it.

Oh, what a miserable position you find yourselves in. You come forward here pleading, "Here is a great power that will control the world." Answer: "It may hurt us." Your answer to that: "Oh, it has not any power; it is simply a debating society." Here is a mighty thing that can command the armies and the navies of the world, can put them in motion, set them sweeping overseas and marching across lands; therefore, danger. Your answer, "It has nothing but an indirect influence." Our answer, "Then your force is impotent." Your answer, "Oh, but our indirect force is quite as effective as a direct force." Mr. President, the gorge rises; I will not finish it.

I started to enumerate the powers of the league. It has power—

(2) To formulate plans for the reduction of armaments, which plans when accepted by the Governments can never be exceeded without the unanimous permission of the council. (Art. 8.)

(3) Advise touching the regulation of the private manufacture of arms, and pass upon the necessities of the members of the league not able to manufacture arms for themselves. (Art. 8.)

Will that be an indirect power, or will it deny armies to the nations of the world that may want at some time to establish independent governments? "Oh, it is only indirect; we are merely going to debate that, but are going to get it done." That is your logic. The league has also the power to—

(4) Appoint a permanent commission to spy upon the members of the league to ascertain whether they have given to other members full information as to their armaments, military and naval programs, and industries adaptable to warlike purposes. (Arts. 8 and 9.)

(5) In case of any external aggression or threat of danger, to advise upon the means of enforcing the obligations of article 10, which require members to defend each other against such aggression. (Art. 10.)

(6) To decide all disputes as to the interpretation of treaties; questions of international law; facts constituting a breach of international law; and the extent and nature of reparation to be made. (Art. 13.)

(7) Upon failure to obey decisions rendered, the council proposes what steps shall be taken to give effect thereto. (Art. 13.)

(8) To formulate plans for the establishment of a permanent court of international justice. (Art. 14.)

(9) To decide that a dispute is one of domestic or international jurisdiction. (Art. 15.)

That is in this league covenant.

(10) To decide whether a member has resorted to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, the effect of such decision being to find the defendant guilty of an act of war.

(11) To decide that a member of the league has disregarded its covenants under articles 12, 13, and 15, and thereupon to—

Subject it—has it any power to subject a State?—to the severance of all trade and financial relations; and to prevent all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the State found guilty and the other members of the league. (Art. 16.)

(12) To recommend to the Governments of the members of the league the military and naval forces and armaments they shall contribute to punish the State found guilty. (Art. 16.)

Are we going to obey, keep faith and furnish our boys, or are we going to repudiate the agreement? If we repudiate the recommendation, every other State will do so, and your league will fall to pieces. You can not have both a league of power and a league that is powerless. You can not go out and tell the American people one day—if I may drop into the vernacular, which is now permissible—that you have a prize fighter that can knock out anything that ever went into the ring and the next day or at the same time declare that he is paralyzed in both his legs and both his arms and that all he can do is to talk. [Laughter.]

(13) It has the power to declare any member of the league an outlaw. (Art. 16.)

Does that mean anything? The league tells you what it means. It means that all intercourse is to be cut off; that goods can not be shipped to you. You are excommunicated. I do not want for a minute to offend anybody's religious sensibilities, but the man who wrote what would happen to a State that was cast out of the league must have read a papal bull of excommunication written in the fourteenth century. I say that with the utmost respect for that great church. When you are excommunicated and put out of the league your nationals can not trade; trade is cut off; commerce is destroyed. This is the thing that they are going to do to us in the name of humanity, and after they have put all this economic pressure on us then they are going to recommend the naval and other forces necessary.

Let me once and for all explode this doctrine of modern humanitarianism. Humane war, if war can be humane, consists in a situation where brave men with guns in their hands stand upon the field of battle and each shoots at the other; each is there to fight and one or the other overcomes. That is war in its humane quality; but when you want war in its hellish quality, when you want the kind of war that is conceived in the womb of hell and given birth through the brains of fiends, conceive that kind of war where instead of men fighting on the field, and thus reducing one or the other to surrender, the babies at home are starved. Economic pressure is the last and final brutality of brutal war. They hope to break the line at the front by breaking the heart of the soldier at the front by pointing to him that his wife's face is pale and pinched; that from the teeth of starvation she draws back the lips of want; that the little baby at her breast is tugging at a dry font; that its limbs are wasting and that death is written on its sweet little countenance. That is what you call economic pressure, is it? That is the humane proposition of modern reformers. It is the most fiendish thing ever conceived. Poison gas is decent compared with it; the torch is respectable; the thumb screw becomes an instrument of love, and the lash only the gentle means of caressing your enemy.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator if he has ever known of any war in the history of the world where the combatants did not strive in every possible way to prevent supplies going to their adversaries?

Mr. REED. I knew the Senator would get there. Of course, that has been done in wars——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Has there ever been a war when it was not done?

Mr. REED. And it has always been regarded as the most brutal part of war. Now, the Senator, standing with the prophesy of the millennium in one hand and in the other the dove of peace, proclaims with his lips that we will preserve the most damnable and hellish characteristic of war, and we will call it economic pressure. Why do you go back and argue for atrocities by saying that atrocities have heretofore been committed? I thought we were to have no more atrocities, but only sweet love, the lullaby of mothers mingling with the cooing of infants, the laughter upon the lips of men mingling with the songs of joy upon the tongue of childhood. And over yonder comes the glorious orb, the orb of the millennium, sending its wondrous colors into the night of ignorance and fear; and riding here in its full effulgence, riding upon the white horse of peace and of promise, is the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, the sun like a halo behind him, and in his hand he proclaims the new doctrine of the millenium: "We will win wars by starving babies to death!" [Laughter.]

Mr. President, let us see whether there is any power of war vested here.

(14) The council may take jurisdiction and decide disputes between members of the league and States not members and decide disputes between two States neither of which are members, whether the nonmember States consent or not. (Art. 17.)

(15) In the case just mentioned the council is expressly authorized to make war upon the States having the dispute. The language is:

> The council may take such measures and make such recommendations as will prevent hostilities and will result in the settlement of the dispute.

The right to take the measures aforesaid is the right to employ armed force and to make war. (Art. 17.)

"The council may take such measures * * * as will prevent hostilities." There is no limit to that. What are those measures? The international army that you know is going to be formed, the nucleus of which is now in Europe, where, according to the arrangement we have made, we have got to keep our troops for 15 years. How long do you suppose it will be, with the good internationalists at the helm, until we will be contributing? Why did the Secretary of War come before the Military Affairs Committee and testify that he had to have 500,000 troops? We never had to have them before. Why did the Chief of Staff swear that he had to have that 500,000 troops in order to comply with our obligations under the league? And why did Josephus Daniels ask for nearly a billion dollars to build fighting ships when there is to be no more war? How can you go out to the people of this country—how dare you go to the people—and tell the mothers that there will be no more war if this league is created, yet asking for the mightiest Navy that ever was constructed under any one order?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If we do not have this league of nations, does not the Senator believe that we will have to have a large Army and a large Navy, and much larger than we would have to have if we did not have this league?

Mr. REED. Not at all, sir. Let me puncture that balloon. [Laughter.] It has floated around here long enough. Why will we have to have it? We got along here in this world very well for a long while with an Army of 25,000, without any Navy at all, and we built a few ships. Then they increased our Army, for our population had enormously increased, and we had what amounted to about a police force. In the days of Roosevelt and Taft we had an authorized Army of 75,000 to 85,000. Did we get along all right? Yes. Did anybody come over here to destroy us? No. Who is going to come now and destroy us?

Now, let us be honest. Let us be fair to the American people. Anyway, let us be fair to ourselves. A man may lie to his neighbor; he may lie to his wife; there may possibly be some reason for both at times [laughter]; but nobody ever ought to lie to himself. Who is going to destroy us?

Is it going to be Austria? We have rent her limb from limb, and have left her a dismembered State. She naturally might want to lick us, but what is she going to do it with? We have taken her guns. We have disarmed her.

Germany? Now, I do not think we need be afraid of Germany. There has been a good deal of talk about "putting up or shutting up," and I suppose it is temerity on the part of anybody, after having been challenged to "put up," if he dares utter a sentence; but I say, while I do not want to practice cruelty on the German people at all, that Germany ought to have been dismembered just as Austria was. She was put together about 50 years ago for the purpose of making a great war power. She embraced, I think, 26 principalities, independent States, and kingdoms, and she could have been taken apart for the same reason; but I waive that. She is disarmed. She is not allowed to make any guns. They have taken her coal mines. They have taken her ships. Is Germany to come over here and destroy us? And if she does, are England and France, that we rescued, going to stand there and see her come here? And if she does come, what will be her fate? Now, I assume that we are going to have sense enough next time to have some guns; and if you have the guns, the experience of this war has shown what will happen.

Well, Germany—anybody that is afraid of Germany for the next 50 years either reckons upon the fact that our associates over there are going to turn in and help her or he reckons without very much judgment.

Then who is going to do it, sir? Is it going to be England? The one great power that might hurt us is England. I am not so much of an Anglomaniac that I am sure she might not attempt it under some circumstances; but would England, with the blood of our sons yet fresh upon her banners, bespattered there by the shell and shrapnel fire of Germans, come over here to destroy us? If so, I want no partnership with her in the league of nations. [Applause in the galleries.]

Would France come—France, whose soil is made sacred by the dead bodies, the decaying dust of 50,000 American boys who went to their death with cheers upon their lips in the defense of France more than in the defense of ourselves? Will France come to pay us back in that coin of perfidy and dishonor which she would deal out to us were she to attack us?

Well, then, who will attack us? There remains but one possible nation, and that is Japan; and you, by this infamous treaty, propose to ratify the turning over to Japan of 40,000,000 Chinamen and to allow her to keep 20,000,000 Koreans, thus raising her for the first time in the history of the world to a great international power. Who is going to come over here and make it necessary to have this mighty army and this navy? And if Japan does ever come, to quote the phrase of another, we will welcome her with bloody hands to hospitable graves.

What is going to make this great army necessary? Is it true, now, that if we do not enter the league of nations France and Japan and Great Britain will join in a conspiracy to destroy us? If that be the quality of their civilization, if that be the character of these nations, then I join in the prayer of Thomas Jefferson: "Would to God that the Atlantic Ocean were a sea of fire, separating us forever from these other lands." If that be the kind and character of nations you are inviting into this partnership, then I say, pray God to forgive you for ever thinking of inviting them into a council with the United States.

These bugaboos will pass away. Of course, we will have some guns, and we will train our boys some, and we will have some ships; and if I were as sure of Great Britain's love and friendship as you gentlemen who advocate this league, I would not build the ships; but I am not quite sure of Great Britain.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then the Senator believes we will not need an army and navy, because the millennium has already arrived?

Mr. REED. Indeed I do not. I do not think we need this great army and navy because the conditions are to-day substantially what they were before the war, except that Germany has been whipped; England and France are bankrupt; the only nations that can hurt us are comparatively less powerful than they were before, and we do not need to have the millennium, or all go half crazy, and dream dreams, and see visions, and catch at things in the air [laughter] in order to escape the burden of great military establishments in this country.

Let me tell you something. There was a time when a lot of the people in the world—and I believe that is the reason why we got into this war—believed that the Yankee, as they call us, was a fat, sleek, overfed lounge-lizard; that he would not fight; that he could not fight; that he was chasing dollars, and had no spirit in him that made it possible for him to go out and die.

And so Germany threw the glove in our face. But that mistake will not be made again for a century of time. [Applause in the galleries.] They found out you can take a boy off an American farm and land him in France, and in two weeks' time he could go over the top with the best of them. They found out these soldiers did not need the discipline of camp and of military establishment. They already had the discipline of American citizenship. They found out that these men could laugh in the face of death, and that they could go down into the shadows with a smile upon their lips. They found out that we can raise 10,000,000 men, if we have to, and that all the powers of earth and hell can not whip us on our own soil. [Applause in the galleries.]

I am not scared about this thing.

I want to finish this speech. I am nearly through. I wish I had not permitted an interruption, because I have made the speech interminably long.

(16) To advise the reconsideration of treaties. (Art. 19.)

(17) To advise regarding the changing of international conditions whose continuance might, in its opinion, endanger the peace. (Art. 19.)

(18) To establish mandatories and determine what States shall be placed under tutelage and guardianship, and regulate the conditions and laws under which millions of their inhabitants shall live. (Art. 22.)

(19) As members of the international labor organization provided for in part 13 of the peace treaty, it undertakes in every part of the world, including the United States, to regulate the hours of work; the labor supply; the prevention of unemployment; the provision of adequate living wages; the protection of the worker against sickness, disease, and injury; the protection of children, young persons, and women; to secure provision for old age and injury; protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own; to secure recognition of the principle of freedom of association; and to bring about the organization of vocational and technical education and other measures. (Art 23; and pt. 13, art. 387.)

(20) It undertakes general supervision over the traffic in women, children, opium, and other dangerous drugs. (Art. 23.)

(21) It undertakes the supervision of the trade in arms and munitions with countries which, in its opinion, should be regulated. (Art. 23.)

(22) It undertakes the regulation of communication and transit of the commerce of all members of the league. (Art. 23.)

(23) It undertakes the prevention and control of disease. (Art. 23.)

(24) It assumes general jurisdiction and control over all international bureaus and commissions now established for the regulation of matters of international interest. (Art. 24.)

(25) It agrees to promote the establishment of Red Cross organizations to prevent disease throughout the world. (Art. 25.)

And now, on top of all these powers and as a capsheaf, I call attention to article 11, which provides:

Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league—

Not the States, but the league—shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. In case any such emergency should arise, the secretary general shall, on the request of any member of the league, forthwith summon a meeting of the council.

It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb either the peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

What I want to drive home is that the true construction of this article (c), its purpose and effect, was disclosed in the speech of the President at Indianapolis on September 4. He said:

Article 11 is my favorite article in the treaty. * * * At present we have to mind our own business, but under the covenant of the league of nations we can mind other peoples' business.

Very true, but at the same time we acquire the right under article 11 to "mind the business" of the other nations of the world we grant to them the right to mind our business.

When we enter the league the provisions of the covenant bind us the same as they bind all other nations. When they grant to us the right to "attend to their business," we likewise grant to them the right to "attend to our business."

When George Washington compelled Cornwallis to haul down the flag of Great Britain at Yorktown he established the right of the American citizens to attend to the business of America.

When Woodrow Wilson left the peace table at Versailles he had sought to grant the right to attend to America's business to the representatives of 31 alien nations.

Where Washington fought to establish the right of this Nation as a sovereign to control its own affairs, Woodrow Wilson counsels with the representatives of kings to transfer the sovereignty Washington gained to a league which they will dominate.

Dropping into common phraseology, and according to the President, when America acquires the right to "stick her nose" into the "business" of 31 alien States, she gives the right to 31 alien States to "stick their 31 alien noses" into the business of the United States. [Laughter.]

The man who is willing to give to any nation or assemblage of nations the right to mind the business of the American people ought to disclaim American citizenship and emigrate to the country he is willing to have mind America's business for her.

In this connection and as showing the bent of the President's mind, I quote the following from his speech at Kansas City on September 6:

I have, let me say, without the slightest affectation, the greatest respect for the United States Senate; but, my fellow citizens, I have come to fight for a cause. That cause—the league of nations—is greater than the Senate. It is greater than the Government. It is as great as the cause of mankind.

I decline to help set up any government greater than that established by the fathers, baptized in the blood of patriots from the lanes of Lexington to the forests of the Argonne, sanctified by the tears of all the mothers whose heroic sons went down to death to sustain its glory and independence—the Government of the United States of America. [Prolonged applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

APPENDIX.

WHAT THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS MEANS FOR AMERICA.

[An address in Denver before the Colorado Bankers' Association at its annual convention, Sept. 12, 1919, by Lee Meriwether.]

"To every man there comes at some time in his life one moment bigger than any of the others, one supreme moment when a great decision must be made, a decision which may make or mar his career. So, too, it is with nations, and such a moment now confronts the American people. A grave problem faces us. If that problem is not wisely decided, the freedom we have thus far had from Old World wars will vanish forever. The splendid advantages resulting from our national youth and from our geographical position, 3,000 miles distant from the nearest of Europe's quarrelsome kingdoms and empires, will be thrown away; instead of being left free to decide for ourselves when it is our interest and duty to incur the terrible sacrifices always incident to war, America will be bound by solemn treaty to take part in any war that may break out in any part of the world. It will not be for the American people to say that American sons shall fight and die in foreign wars. Article 10 of the league of nations covenant expressly binds us to 'preserve the territorial integrity' of more than 40 foreign nations from 'external aggression'; and the same article says that the council of the league shall advise us 'upon the means by which' our 'obligations shall be fulfilled.' Mark well the word 'shall.' The league council, not the American people, decides when the American people must wage war, how many American lives shall be sacrificed, and how many American dollars shall be spent.

"For 125 years, by following Washington's wise advice to mind our own affairs, to let other nations mind theirs, and steadfastly to avoid entangling foreign alliances, America has waxed peaceful, powerful, and prosperous. In the 105 years ending in 1917 Europe fought one bloody war after another, but not into a single one of her more than 60 wars did it become either our duty or interest to enter. In 1917 an exceptional crisis forced us to fight a brutal military autocracy that had insulted our flag and murdered our citizens on the high seas of the world. Because we were obliged to wage this one war out of 60 wars that Europe fought in the nineteenth century it is now proposed to sign a treaty that binds us to take part in every future war that may be fought in any part of the world. And this regardless of whether those future wars have even a remote connection with American rights or interests.

"To justify this astounding policy men of high rank and official power preach strange doctrines and propound strange questions. They ask if we want to break the heart of Europe? Let us ask them if they want to break the heart of America, if they want to barter away the independence of America? No man wants to break the heart of Europe, but frankly, if forced to make a choice I would rather break the heart of Europe than crush the spirit of America and barter away the independence of my native land.

"The men urging us to abandon the policy of minding our own business, the men who want America to meddle in Europe's affairs, give no logical reasons for their amazing scheme. They deal only in glittering generalities. They support their position only by bold assertions. They talk only of visions and voices in the air.

"My friends, I, too, hear voices in the air—the voices of Washington, of Lincoln, of McKinley, of Grover Cleveland, of that great American, Theodore Roosevelt. I hear the voices of thousands of Americans who gave their lives that our country may live free and great and powerful. And these voices are beseeching me, they are beseeching you, my countrymen, to preserve America's independence. They beg you to keep out of Europe's race and religious wars. They implore you not to give away with the pen what Washington won with the sword. Whatever others may do, I shall heed these voices rather than the voices of internationalists who talk so much of the 'hearts of men everywhere' that they forget the hearts of men in America; of dreamers who, to save the heart of Europe from breaking, are willing to break the heart of America; of visionary idealists who are willing to see America's sons fight and die in the wars of foreign lands with whose affairs America is not even remotely connected.

"The men who urge America to abandon Washington's advice to keep out of entangling foreign alliances, the men who want America to embark upon strange and stormy seas the opposite shores of which may be so rockbound as to dash our ship of state to destruction—these men deal in abuse rather than in appeals to reason. They denounce as pygmy minds with narrow vision all who prefer common sense to their visions and their voices in the air. Though they denounce my mind as pygmy and my vision as narrow, that shall not deter me from telling you frankly that my thoughts have ever been, and ever shall be, of my own people and of my own native America.

"Three years ago I went to France a nationalist; when I came back a few months ago I was more of a nationalist than before. No matter how blind a man may be, he can not remain three years in the Old World amid 57 varieties of peoples, 57 different races and religions, each race, each religion the age-long cause of uncounted feuds and wars and not become more of a nationalist, more of an American, than ever. When my war work in France ended and the clang and clamor of Europe's clashing interests faded from my ears; when at last I turned my back upon the many-tongued nations, each of them greedily grabbing the spoils awarded them as victors in a World War; when we entered New York Harbor and suddenly the Statue of Liberty towered high above us—ah, my friends, I confess to you that statue then seemed to me the most beautiful sight my eyes had ever beheld, and I understood what the soldier by my side meant when he exclaimed to the Goddess of Liberty:

"'Old girl, I love you; but if ever you want to see me again you'll have to turn your head and look toward the shore!'

"That soldier was content to remain the rest of his life in America. If another military colossus murders our citizens and insults our flag as Germany did, that soldier will be ready to cross the seas and fight again. But he will never be ready to cross the seas to fight in a war between foreign nations about controversies that do not concern either the interest or the duty of America. Where there is one world war in which America must perforce take a part, there are scores of small wars in which there is no reason on earth why we should interfere, and that soldier knows the league of nations covenant, as now drawn, will force us into those small wars, because article 10 of that covenant in express terms binds America to 'preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity * * * of all members of the league.'

"If anybody attacks something you have pledged your honor to 'preserve,' the only way you can keep your pledge will be to fight the fellow who makes the attack. For instance, should China try to recover Shantung, which was carved by the sword out of her heart and given to Japan, not because Japan has a right to own a part of China but because Japan is strong and China is weak, that will be 'external aggression' by China against Japan—and article 10 binds us to preserve Japan's territorial integrity from 'external aggression.'

"Is it possible democratic America wants to fight for a despotic empire's 'right' to retain possession of another country's land; and that, too, of a country that is America's friend, of a country that stood by America's side in the fight against Prussian autocracy? China furnished men, ships, and money to help defeat Germany, and we reward her by assenting to Japan's forcibly taking from China one of her richest Provinces. Is not that shameful enough without pledging ourselves to use our fleets and armies to protect Japan if ever China seeks to undo the wrong done her? Suppose the Paris peace conference had given England New York; what would be thought of France if she not only assented to that crime, but if she also signed a treaty pledging the use of French armies and French fleets to fight us if we ever tried to take New York back again and replace it among our list of American States? Such a thing is, of course, unthinkable; the might and majesty of the American Republic is now known to all the world, and peace commissioners, when they rob a country of a Province, are careful not to select a rich and powerful Nation like ours. But the principle is the same. The Paris commissioners had no more right to give a Province of China to Japan than they had to give an American State to England. And so, fellow citizens, in spite of the great respect I feel for our President, I dare say to you, in first assenting to the rape of China and then in asking us to accept article 10, which binds America to guarantee Japan in the permanent possession of her ill-gotten spoils, President Wilson made a frightful mistake.

"Recently Archbishop Glennon, of St. Louis, said:

"'Every act of conquest, every acre of ground stolen, every land looted and taken over by the looter comes now, through article 10, for the world's benediction and protection.

"'And not only do we give through this article our approval and benediction to all the successful crimes of history, but we guarantee protection to the criminals!'

"Splendid words! Splendid archbishop!

"I am not a Catholic, but I am an American and I recognize, I admire, I love a patriot when I see him, regardless of his race, creed, or religion. America is fortunate in owning such patriots. And America is fortunate in having a Senate which dares do its duty in the face of popular clamor and despite the threats of men of exalted place and power. Those of us who remember our history recall that 20 centuries ago there was a republic whose dominion stopped only at the limits of the then known world. But that great republic became a despotism and the Roman Senate degenerated into a bunch of rubber-stamp puppets because it centered in Cæsar's hands, one after the other, all the powers of the Roman State.

"Thank God, my countrymen, that America's Senate scorns to make of itself a rubber stamp, that it refuses to make our Republic a one-man Government by placing in the President's hands all the powers of the American State. Though denounced as men who ought to be hanged, though by turns cajoled and threatened by the Executive power of our Government—a power far more absolute than that of many a kingdom or empire—the majority of our Senators dares to vote as their immortal reason and conscience bid them, and not as they are commanded to vote by a would-be president of the world.

SHALL AMERICA FIGHT THE BATTLES OF THE WORLD?

"Article 10 pledges us to 'preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity' of all the nations which are now, or which may hereafter become, members of the league. That is, if any one of forty-odd foreign nations is attacked anywhere by anybody about anything, wholly regardless of the merits of the controversy, article 10 pledges America to fight for that nation. Are American mothers willing to make this pledge? Are they willing to sacrifice their sons to preserve from attack two score of foreign lands, all of them remote from our shores, many of them absolutely of no concern to either American duty or American interests? No matter how despotic a nation may be, no matter how righteous may be the effort of a people to break away from a despot's sway, if at any time in any land a fight for freedom is made, not only does article 10 pledge America to refrain from helping the patriots, as France helped George Washington's armies, but if any other nation helps them that will be 'external aggression' against the tyrant, and America will be obligated to use her fleet and Army to crush the patriots and help the tyrant.

"Fully to realize what frightful injustice article 10 is capable of working, let us apply it to American history.

"In 1776 had France been a member of a league containing such a pledge, instead of being free to help the American Colonies, she would have been in honor bound to help England the moment Von Steuben, Dekalb, Pulaski, Kosciusko, and other European lovers of liberty offered their swords to George Washington. Those men committed external aggression upon England's territorial integrity, whereupon, under her pledge to preserve England's territorial integrity, France automatically would have been required to use her fleet and army to fight the American Colonies instead of to help them.

"In 1898 we helped Cuba free herself from Spain, but had we then been a member of a league containing article 10 we would have been bound to stand aside while Spain crushed the Cubans. If, our hearts melted at the sight of suffering inflicted by Spanish tyranny, we had disregarded our treaty obligations and in spite thereof had gone to the aid of the Cuban patriots, then England, France, and every other member of the league would have been bound to attack the United States. For only by attacking us could they have fulfilled their pledge to preserve Spain's territorial integrity from external aggression. Our aid to the Cubans certainly was "external" aggression upon Spain; it resulted in Spain's losing a part of her territory—Cuba. But does any American regret the aid given to the islanders who fought so long for freedom? Does any American wish that in 1898 America had been a member of a league which would have obligated her to preserve Spain's territorial integrity?

"Do the proposers of the Paris plan think the time will never recur when a people may again be as right in fighting for freedom as were the American Colonies and the Cubans? And when that time comes again will Americans wish to use their fleet and Army to preserve the territorial integrity of the State, perhaps despotic State, against which the patriots of a future day will be struggling for freedom? Will they not rather wish to do as our fathers did—extend a helping hand to the patriots? The world may well wish to preserve the territorial integrity of a peaceful little State like Belgium when attacked by a military collosus like Germany, but what liberty lover will wish to preserve the territorial integrity of a despotic empire whose people demand liberty? Article 10 does not discriminate between a France helping American patriots, or an America helping Cuban patriots, and a Germany attacking Belgium. Technically, in 1776, France was as guilty of external aggression against England as in 1914 Germany was guilty of external aggression against Belgium. But morally the two cases are as wide apart as the poles, and article 10 ought to recognize that difference instead of regarding them both in the same light, and imposing the same penalties for a French aggression upon England for the noble purpose of helping the American Colonies in 1776 as for a German aggression upon Belgium in 1914 for the wicked purpose of gaining despotic mastery of the world. Article 10 will prevent a future France from helping a future infant nation win liberty from a future kingdom that may be as despotic as the Tory England of 1776.

"Article 10 is further open to the objection of being one-sided. It is as if a bankrupt gambler should say to a man who has prospered because he has worked hard and lived justly: 'You guarantee me and I will guarantee you.'

"Fine, surely, for the gambler, but is it fine for the other man? For centuries Europe's states have fought and persecuted one another in race and religious wars. Our ancestors got so tired of their eternal wars, they quit Europe and founded homes in a new world, where by minding their own business they have grown great and prosperous. But Europe kept on with feuds and fights; in the last century there was a war in Europe on an average of every other year—more than 50 wars in 100 years. Europe became bankrupt. And so now it says to us: 'You guarantee me and I will guarantee you.'

"With colonies all over the world England is liable to get into a row anywhere at any time. The United States, compact and geographically isolated, in all her history has never been attacked except by one power—England—and that was a century ago, when we were small and feeble. There is no reasonable probability that any state will again cross thousands of miles of ocean to attack the powerful people we have now become, and surely America has nothing to fear from Mexico, Costa Rica, or any other of our near neighbors. Therefore, in return for preserving us from dangers which do not exist we are asked to agree to fight in any part of the world where any of England's possessions—loot acquired in the wars of three centuries—may be made the subject of 'external aggression.' Suppose Uncle Sam and Miss Britannia are in a ballroom where people constantly trip over Miss Britannia's long train dress, and Miss Britannia says: 'Sam, if you will fight every man who steps on my long train gown I'll fight every fellow that steps on your pants.' Would that be fair play? Would Sam agree to such an arrangement simply because Miss Britannia called it 'reciprocal'?

SHALL AMERICA NOT ONLY ASSENT TO SHADY, SECRET BARGAINS, BUT ALSO SPEND AMERICAN MONEY AND SACRIFICE AMERICAN LIVES TO MAKE THOSE BARGAINS A PERMANENT SUCCESS?

"In February, 1917, after our diplomatic relations with Germany had been ruptured, when it was certain we soon would be in the war, Japan said to England:

"'We will let you take all the islands in the Pacific Ocean south of the Equator if you will let us take all the islands north of the Equator, and also the Chinese Province of Shantung containing 30,000,000 people and rich lands, railroads, and mines.'

"England agreed, and so at the Paris peace conference, despite the raw injustice of the deal, despite the fact that President Wilson himself declared it immoral and unjust, it was consummated; and now America is asked not only to sanction the deed but to 'preserve' the spoils of that secret bargain to the two nations who engaged in it. Shantung is as much China's to-day as it was before the Paris peace commissioners gave it to Japan, and while America may not care to fight Japan in order to compel her to return stolen goods, surely it would be infamous were America to help crush China if, as is probable, she should some day seek to drive the Japanese out of China back to Japan where they belong. Article 10 pledges America to do precisely this infamous thing; hence for this reason if no other the Senate should refuse to ratify the league of nations covenant as it now is drawn.

EVEN AMERICA'S RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE IS RESTRICTED BY THE LEAGUE.

"Under article 8 of the league covenant the representatives of foreign nations advise America what size fleet and army she may have; and, once the size is agreed on, it can never be increased except by the unanimous consent of those foreign nations.

"Suppose, because of frightful conditions in Mexico, or because of any other reason, an increase in the size of the American Army becomes necessary; as things now are it is the American people who decide that question, and add to their armed forces as they think their dignity and safety require. But under article 8 America must go hat in hand and ask the permission of eight foreign gentlemen sitting in a world capital at Geneva, Switzerland. And if a single one of those representatives of European and Asiatic kingdoms and empires says 'No,' then America must come home again, like a whipped cur with its tail between its legs, powerless to defend itself, powerless to add a single soldier to its Army or a single ship to its fleet because, forsooth, one of eight foreign gentlemen in Geneva refuses his gracious consent! Is it possible any red-blooded American can approve this shameful abdication of his country's sovereignty? Can any patriotic American approve a treaty which thus puts our proud Republic of 100,000,000 people at the mercy of any one of eight foreigners, representatives of kingdoms and empires, none of which loves us over well, and some of which would gladly see the American eagle plucked of its feathers?

AMERICA CLASSED BY THE LEAGUE WITH HAITI AND HEDJAZ.

"Article 3 gives Great Britain six votes in the league's assembly, America one. Even in passing on American questions Great Britain will have six votes to our one. We, with a hundred million population, are given only the same voting power as is given the Negro Republic of Liberia, in Africa; the nondescript kingdom of Hedjaz, in Asia; and the semisavage island of Haiti, in the Carribean Sea! I admire the many splendid pages written in history by England, but why give her, why give any foreign nation six times the voting power in the assembly of the league of nations that is given our own Republic?

"My countrymen, I assert—and I weigh my words as I speak—that it is a shameful betrayal of America's greatness and glory to give England six votes to our one, and to rank our Republic, with its hundred millions of the most civilized, intelligent people on earth, alongside the half-baked, semicivilized black and brown republics, kingdoms and republics on the continents of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and on all the islands of the Seven Seas! But Great Britain is given at the start six votes, and, because of her far-flung Empire, of her influence in all parts of the globe, she will dominate the votes of a number of other nations.

"The vision-voices-in-the-air statesmen answer this in two ways: First, they say India, Canada, New Zealand, Australia, and South Africa will vote as individual entities, not as parts of the British Empire, and not as Great Britain wishes them to vote; and, second, they say it really does not matter how many votes Great Britain has, since everything must be unanimous, and one vote is as good as a dozen to block any move or prevent any policy that a nation does not like. Were this second answer founded on fact, it would mean that this league-of-nations scheme, which is heralded as the greatest achievement of man since Magna Charta was wrung from King John at Runnymede, is in reality an impotent instrument; it would mean that the single voice of a half-savage Asiatic kingdom like Hedjaz or a black island Republic like Haiti could veto and prevent the efforts of all the great nations of the earth to effect some vital reform. But the answer is not founded on fact.

"On many vital questions a majority of the votes cast in the assembly of the league of nations is sufficient to adopt or reject a given policy. This being so, it is obvious that Great Britain will dominate and control the assembly because of her six votes to start with, and because of her great influence over most of the other nations represented in the league. France could not remain a great power if England were hostile to her; Italy, which projects like a great boot into the Mediterranean, has 1,500 miles of coast line to defend. Were England hostile to Italy the Italian nation's supply of food and coal would be cut off and the people would both starve and freeze. In any controversy between England and the United States, no matter how right Italy and France may believe the United States to be, is it certain they will be willing to incur the enmity of a near-by and powerful nation merely to do abstract justice to a distant country from which they have nothing either to fear or to hope? They may do so, but so may the friend and neighbor of your opponent in a lawsuit decide the case impartially. But what would be thought of a lawyer who accepted as a juror the son or brother, or even an intimate friend, of his client's opponent? And yet our objection to giving England six votes as against America's one is met with the reply that England's colonies and dominions will vote to suit themselves and not as England wishes them to vote! On matters concerning only themselves no doubt they will vote to suit themselves, but where there is a controversy between England and America that does not affect any of England's dominions, to doubt that those dominions would be partial to England is to ignore the commonest principles which govern men, and which will continue to govern them as long as it is human nature to think of yourself, of your family, and of your friends before you think of strangers whose welfare is less dear to you and whose good or ill will is of less importance to you. Applaud England, if you will, for the great work done by her in the war, but for our own sake and our posterity's sake let us not give back to England the independence we forced from her at the point of Washington's sword. And that, my friends, is what we shall be doing if we accept this English-drawn covenant which gives England six votes at the head of the table, while the great American Republic is seated at the foot of the table alongside Hedjaz, Haiti, Liberia, and the other petty nations of the world.

"When, a few years ago, Japan connived with Mexico to obtain a naval base in Magdalena Bay south of California, our enforcement of the Monroe doctrine caused Japan to withdraw. Had the league of nations been then in force, the matter would have been referred to the council at Geneva, Switzerland, a council dominated by Great Britain, herself anxious to get a footing in Mexico, where there are oil fields capable of furnishing fuel to the British Navy for centuries. Is it likely such a council would respect our Monroe doctrine? But even if a square deal could be obtained from the council, under article 15 either Japan or Mexico would have the right to refer the dispute to the assembly, a body in which Haiti, Siam, Liberia, and the other 'half-baked' backward nations of the earth each have a voting power equal to that of the United States!

"Twenty years ago, when England trumped up a pretext to seize Venezuela, the strong, rugged President then in the White House lost no time asking European and Asiatic nations to make England behave. Grover Cleveland politely but firmly told England to get out of Venezuela, and England got!

"When Germany harbored designs upon South America and sought a footing where her guns might dominate the Panama Canal, Roosevelt did not ask the consent of eight men representing European and Asiatic nations to tell the Kaiser to stay on his own side of the ocean. Roosevelt bluntly told the German ambassador if the Kaiser did not abandon his designs upon South America, Dewey would go with the American Fleet and shoot the Kaiser out of South American waters!

"In 1866, when France installed an emperor in Mexico, America did not seek Europe's and Asia's consent before telling France we did not want an empire set up across our Texas border. We told France to get out or we would put her out!

"If ambitious European and Asiatic potentates again threaten our national safety by such encroachments, shall we settle those vital American questions ourselves, or shall we submit them to an executive council wherein America will have but one vote, and where the other eight votes will be cast by representatives of Old World nations, whose interests are different from and often opposed to ours? The best of European and Asiatic powers love America none too well; the best of them would not be averse to destroying our predominance in the Western Hemisphere; the best of them, if it could, would not hesitate to plant its flag on American soil.

"It is said America need not worry over the fact that opposed to her one vote will be eight votes of European and Asiatic nations, because the Paris plan confers no real power upon the executive council of the league; that the council may only 'advise' and 'recommend.' In several of the 26 articles very specific and very serious powers are conferred upon the executive council. But apart from those articles, and considering only articles 10 and 16, which say the executive council shall 'advise' and 'recommend' what 'effective or naval forces' shall be used to protect the pledges made by the States members of the league, let me observe that a treaty is not needed to confer the power to 'advise' or 'recommend.' Anyone has the right to recommend anything to anybody. If these articles merely confer a right which everybody in the world already has, then they are superfluous. Of course, the fact is that article 10 binds each and every nation in the league, at least morally, to do what the council advises. If this is not the case, if our promise to preserve the territorial integrity of other States does not mean that American armies and fleets will fight for those States if and when they are attacked; if our pledge will be fulfilled merely by writing a note telling Russia, Germany, or whatever power attacks a fellow State member of the league that such an attack is naughty—if that is all our promise means, then, of course, the Paris plan is not subject to the objection that it may involve America in wars regardless of America's wishes and regardless of the merits of the particular case. But if that is all the plan means, then the pledge to preserve other nations' territorial integrity will not be worth much either to them or to ourselves. And if that is all it means, the fact should be precisely stated, for lack of a precise statement as to whether a State did or did not have a right to secede the Constitution of the United States led to a civil war. But it is absurd to say article 10 would not bind America to fight for foreign nations. The language is too plain to dispute. Moreover, President Wilson himself stated at the recent White House conference with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that under article 10 the United States will be under the 'strongest possible moral compulsion' to fight for any State member of the league that becomes hereafter the subject of 'external aggression.' What America is morally bound to do America will do. So the question is this: Shall we accept a treaty which means that American boys must fight and die for foreign lands whenever any one of those foreign lands is attacked by another nation? Speaking for myself, I shall always be willing to fight for America, and may sometimes be willing to fight for foreign nations, but when I fight for foreigners I want to be sure their cause is a just one. I do not want to fight on Japan's side if some day China tries to take back from Japan her stolen Province of Shantung. If compelled to fight in a Chinese-Japanese war, I would choose to fight for rather than against China. Article 10, however, leaves America no choice; in advance it pledges America to fight for Japan despite the fact that President Wilson and all of the American peace commissioners have recognized the injustice of giving Shantung to Japan and have protested formally against the wrong.

ARE WORLD CONDITIONS SO CHANGED THAT AMERICA CAN NO LONGER KEEP OUT OF EUROPE'S WARS?

"They who say the world is now so small that America can not stay out of Europe's troubles forget that in the recent war, as in all other wars for a thousand years, the English Channel enabled England's fleet to save England from invasion; and the English Channel is only 20 miles wide. With 3,000 miles of ocean to our east and 8,000 miles of ocean to our west, we, with our great population and resources, are practically invulnerable. Where is there in all the world a nation which has the power, even if it has the desire, to cross thousands of miles of water and conquer 100,000,000 people? There is no such nation, yet in order to escape a danger which does not exist some people urge America to pool its fortunes with the bankrupt States of Europe and Asia. If we follow this advice, America will lose the splendid advantage of her national youth, of her freedom from ancient feuds, of the vast benefits resulting from her geographical position—and gain what? A partnership in the jealousies, in the race and religious hatreds, in the age-long quarrels of the Old World! The world so small that America can no longer keep out of Europe's troubles? Why, for one European war big enough to involve America there were in the nineteenth century 50 European wars into which neither our duty nor our interest required us to enter. In 1812 England dragged us into the Napoleonic wars; in 1917 Germany forced us into the recent World War. But between 1812 and 1917 America enjoyed a profound peace, so far as European wars were concerned. Was this because there were no European wars? No; in the 105 years between 1812 and 1917 Europe had scores of wars. France blazed with revolution in 1830, as did all Europe in 1848. In 1856 England, France, Italy, Turkey, and Russia shed rivers of blood in the Crimea. There were frightful wars in two-thirds of Europe's States in 1864, 1866, 1870, and 1876. In 1897 Greece and Turkey cut each other's throats, and in 1899 England assaulted and crushed two small republics in South Africa. In 1905 Japan and Russia went to war, as did Serbia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Turkey in 1912, and again in 1913.

"If it be said none of these wars would have happened had there been a league of nations, we may admire the sincerity but we will hardly respect the judgment of the man who thus argues. Race antipathies being what they are, nations being so prone to resort to force to grasp what greed suggests, the man who asserts that a paper agreement to be good will make men good must be either ignorant of history or must have a faith as beautiful and, alas! as groundless as is the faith of a child in Santa Claus.

"A striking illustration of this fact has occurred in our own time. In 1878 the congress of great powers at Berlin decreed, among other things, that the two Balkan States of Bosnia and Herzegovina should be free. Austria was to be their 'mandatory,' but all the powers of Europe solemnly promised to preserve the independence of those two Provinces. Thirty years passed; then without a word of warning Austria annexed Bosnia and Herzegovina and raised above their soil the Austrian flag. I happened to be traveling in those Provinces at the time Austria thus defied the great powers; Austrian soldiers were everywhere; the air was thick with rumors of war; Russia growled, England, France, and the other powers protested, but there was no war. Were it possible to turn an X-ray on the Austrian cabinet just before it decreed the annexation of the two forbidden Provinces we would find some of the more timid, or the more law-abiding, members of the cabinet saying to Baron Burian, the prime minister, 'All the great powers are pledged to protect Bosnia and Herzegovina; Austria can not stand up against all the great powers; therefore your policy, Mr. Prime Minister, will bring us not two Provinces, but a disastrous war.'

"Whereupon Baron Burian answered:

"'Gentlemen, much water has passed under the mill since 1878. Since then England and France have stood face to face at Fashoda, in Africa, on the verge of war. Italy has had her hands badly burned in Tripoli. The Russian bear's claws have been clipped by Japan. Do you think those countries have nothing better to do than go to war about a couple of Balkan Provinces? Nonsense. They will not do it. They have too much sense to wage war about a matter that in no way affects their own interests. Now, while they are busy trying to settle disputes that have arisen between themselves, now while they are harrassed by domestic problems that have arisen within their own borders—now, gentlemen, is the time for Austria to seize these rich Provinces. We can do so safely. The powers will grumble, but they will not incur the stupendous sacrifices of war merely to keep a foolish pledge made 30 years ago at Berlin.'

"The event proved Burian was right. The powers did grumble, but they did not declare war, and Austria retained possession of the two Balkan Provinces. Will not history repeat itself? President Wilson urges that Fiume be denied to Italy and given to the new Slavic nation, but will that lessen by a hair's breadth Italy's conviction that of right Fiume should be Italian? Six hundred years ago, in his 'Divine Comedy,' Dante said the steep mountain chain rising north and east of Fiume is Italy's natural boundary line. For six centuries Italians have believed with Dante that Italy's safety depends upon her control of the Adriatic's eastern shores, that only by such control can Italy safeguard herself. Every now and then during the past dozen centuries Venice, Ravenna, Bari, Brindisi, and other Italian cities have been plundered by the Slavs, the Turks, and the other fierce peoples of the East who poured through the Balkan mountain passes, descended to the Adriatic, crossed its narrow channel, and brought fire and sword to the Italian people. Will a mere paper decree, that hereafter men must be good and not attack their neighbors, convince Italy that she need fear no more attacks by her only half-civilized eastern neighbors? Certainly not; therefore what sensible man believes the decision of the Paris peace commissioners has changed the six-century old conviction of the Italian people that Italy ought to control the Adriatic Sea? If some years hence a future Italian prime minister follows Baron Burian's example—proposes to his colleagues to seize Fiume, which in 1919, according to the Italian view, was so unjustly awarded to the Slavic nation, will not that future cabinet discussion be a duplicate of the 1908 cabinet debate in Vienna? Shall we not hear one of the Italian cabinet say: 'Mr. Prime Minister, the league of nations is pledged to preserve the Slavs from external aggression. To seize Fiume will be external aggression, which according to article 10 means all the world will jump on us. Surely you do not imagine Italy can withstand all the world?'

"And we can hear the future Baron Burian reply:

"'Gentlemen, much water has passed under the mill since 1919. Trade disputes have arisen between France and England. Japan is not now pulling England's chestnuts out of the fire; she is too busy digesting the Provinces she stole from China. As for America, she accepted the sacrifices of war in 1917 because a military giant sank her ships and murdered her citizens; also because America knew if the German giant mastered Europe he would next try to master America. America had to get into that war, but America has no interest in Fiume; she is busy with troubles of her own, so you may rest assured, gentlemen, she will not accept the tremendous sacrifices of war merely to preserve Fiume to the Slavic nation.'

"When this or some similar crisis occurs will America forswear her promise to protect the Slavs from external aggression? Or will she send her fleets and armies across the ocean to fight Italy and prevent her from realizing her aspiration of 600 years? One of these courses she must pursue if she signs a treaty containing article 10, but the adoption of either course would be extremely unwise, extremely unfortunate for our national honor and for our welfare as a people.

"In 1787 some men feared the Federal Constitution would be a failure; their fears proved unfounded. Therefore fears that the league of nations will not work are unfounded.

"Thus argue the brilliant statesmen who see visions and hear voices in the air. Let us see if this argument squares with common sense. Once, when Uncle Sam proposed a partnership with Tom and Jerry, Mr. Doubting Thomas said all partnerships are doubtful affairs and predicted this one would not work. Uncle Sam said: 'Of course partnerships are uncertain, but Tom and Jerry are friends whom I have known for a long time. They live near me, and the interests we have in common will move us to bear and forbear when differences arise between us.'

"The partnership was formed, and even though they all knew each other and had interests in common it came near failing; in fact, they fell out with one another and fought like cats and dogs for four years. However, on the whole, the venture proved successful. Then, later on, Uncle Sam was invited to form a partnership, not with men he knew or whose interests were identical with his, but with a job lot of fellows who spoke 57 different languages, professed 57 different religions, and lived in remote parts of the world. Some of them were only half civilized, many of them were jealous of Sam's prosperity, and all of them were either anxious to borrow his money or to get a foothold on some part of his big farm. Will Uncle Sam be considered wise; will he be suspected of having even ordinary common sense if to this invitation he replies:

"'There is no use for anybody to warn me against entering this partnership. In 1787 Doubting Thomas said a partnership with my friends and neighbors would not work. Well, it did work, so now I believe in being partners with anybody and everybody in the world. I will not even draw the line at fellows like John Bull, who speak my language and have had some experience in business affairs. I mean to tie up with fellows of all races, religions, and languages; with fellows who are civilized, half civilized, and savage. If I can get along with Americans, why can not I get along with the wandering Arabs of Hedjaz, with the black voodoo worshippers of Haiti, with the turbulent Turk, with the inscrutable Japs, with the groveling creatures of all the backward countries of Europe, Asia, and Africa?'

"If Uncle Sam talks like this, no doubt he will thereby qualify as a vision-voices-in-the-air statesman, but what will be said of his sanity? And what will happen to his new partnership? Will he not quickly learn that the success of a partnership depends upon the character of the partners and the mutuality of their interests?

"The dreamers also say: 'Individuals no longer settle their own disputes; they refer them to courts of law. Why, then, may not nations settle their disputes by law instead of by arms?'

"Arbitration between nations is a splendid thing. By all means aim at that ideal; but it would be a fatal fallacy to disarm our Nation, make it as powerless as China, and trust to some untried world court to secure the rights, the happiness, and the prosperity of the American people. Those who, because individuals disarm themselves and settle private controversies in a law court, think, therefore, nations may do the same, lose sight of the limitations of human nature and human capacity. By expanding his plant and employing 40,000 men, Mr. Ford increased his factory efficiency. Because of this will anyone say the greater the plant and the more men employed the greater will be the factory's efficiency? Forty thousand may not be the limit to which man may go without reaching the point where size will be a drawback instead of an advantage, but that there is a limit somewhere can not be doubted. Certainly no man nor set of men can successfully manage a hundred million employees. Just where the limit lies I shall not venture to say, but certainly somewhere between Mr. Ford's 40,000 and a hundred millions there is a point where the plant would break of its own weight, a point where it would be physically and mentally impossible for any finite human intellect to grasp all the details and coordinate them into a successful whole.

"The American people have succeeded beyond their expectations, and despite the prophecies of Mr. Doubting Thomas, in welding 48 States together. Does it follow that they can weld the whole world together? A citizen of one American State may say, 'The other 47 States are in the same boat with my State. We all speak the same language and have the same general interests; hence there is a good chance that we may get along together.'

"The citizens of the other American States feel the same way about it, and, barring one question which all the courts in America were not able to settle, a question that only four years of bloody civil war were able to settle, the plan has worked well. But because you can get along with friends and neighbors, does it follow that you can get along with a thousand fellows you never heard of, fellows some of whom are only half civilized, many of whom are greedy and grasping, all of whom are remote from you and opposed to you by reason of age-long race and religious passions and prejudices? You are willing to submit your private grievances to a Chief Justice of the United States, because you know him. Because, too, if he proves inefficient or unjust you can impeach him and choose a Chief Justice who will be efficient and just. But what will Americans know of the supreme judges of the world? Who will choose those judges? If they prove inefficient or unjust America can not remove them. Who can? And how can they enforce their decisions? Suppose a question of immigration arises. No country in the world has anything to fear from American immigration, but there is hardly one of the densely populated countries of Europe and Asia that does not look longingly at America's vast expanse of almost virgin land. A dispute arises, say, over the right of Japanese to settle in California. America claims this is a domestic question; Japan says it is not. The supreme court of the world is called on to decide the dispute. The judges of that court are composed of men from European and Asiatic kingdoms as anxious as is Japan to have the right to send emigrants to America. If they decide the dispute in Japan's favor, shall America abide by the result, as an individual abides by a decision of the Supreme Court at Washington?

"My friends, I have not time to make, nor have you the patience to hear, a detailed argument of this phase of the question; what I have said, however, may suffice to indicate the fallacy and the danger of settling great questions of State on lines of pure theory, leaving out of the account the limitations of human nature. The individual does well to throw away his gun and let local courts settle disputes which arise with his neighbors; a county does well to join with other counties and let county disputes be settled by a State supreme court.

"The 48 American States do well to let their disputes be decided by a Supreme Court at Washington. For we are all Americans; we all live in one country; we know one another and have national interests in common. But because these things are so, it does not follow that there is no limit to the principle. I am content that my home State, Missouri, shall be subordinate to the United States, but not in the present state of civilization, or rather lack of civilization, would I be willing to see our proud Republic, with its hundred million of the most intelligent people on earth subject to a world supreme court at Geneva, Switzerland, as Missouri is subject to the decrees of the Federal Supreme Court at Washington. The proposal to let Costa Rica, Siam, Liberia, Hedjaz, and a score of other semicivilized, and even savage, nations have a voice, however small, in the affairs of the American Republic—such a proposal is monstrous and should, and I believe will, be indignantly rejected by the United States Senate.

"Once it was my fortune to walk from one end of Europe to the other. I came to know the hot-blooded men of Spain and Portugal and the peasants of Italy, Bulgaria, Turkey, and Russia. I hobnobbed with the fierce mountaineers of Montenegro. And these experiences over all Europe during nearly two years gave me some understanding of the racial and religious hatreds which sway millions of people in the old world. Antagonisms a thousand years old still divide one State from another; yes, divide one section from another section of the same State. To-day, as for centuries past, the Spaniard of Catalonia hates the Spaniard of Andalusia, and only a few months ago wanted to secede from Spain and was prevented from doing so only by force.

"Since Cæsar threw his bridge across the Rhine French and German have regarded one another with distrust and suspicion. In Greece I have talked with men whose one aim in life seemed to be to cut a Bulgarian's throat, while in Bulgaria men have told me they regarded all Greeks as rascals and robbers. In parts of Dalmatia I noticed many men go armed to the teeth because in a space smaller than Denver is a confusion of tongues like unto that of the Tower of Babel. Each man thinks his race ought to prevail. The Slavs have history to prove they should rule, but the Italians have history to prove that Dalmatia was Italian when Diocletian left Rome to raise cabbages in the palace gardens at Spalato! Against both Slavs and Italians are the German-Austrians, who oppose their history. And so between the lot of them no man feels safe in leaving home unless armed with guns and daggers!

"Looking back upon my life with Europe's common people it is not possible to believe that any mere paper agreement to keep the peace will still the passions and prejudices or eradicate the selfishness of these many-tongued nations. And so this question arises: Is not America to be congratulated on following Washington's advice to avoid permanent foreign alliances? Had we not followed that advice, had we been a member of a league obligating us to intervene in Europe's wars, then instead of a century of profound peace—so far as Europe's wars are concerned—is it not certain America, like Europe throughout the nineteenth century, would have been involved in one war after another?

"In 1815 after Europe had been weltering in war for 20 years, the last three of which found the United States drawn into the turmoil, mankind longed for peace, as it longs now. And then, as now, a league of nations was proposed to abolish war. But the American statesmen of that day, while acknowledging the lofty idealism of the scheme, realized that human nature can not be changed over night, that men can not divest themselves of selfishness merely by adopting a resolution to follow the golden rule. And so our statesmen of that day declined to enter the league formed in Europe at the conclusion of the Napoleonic wars. Thomas Jefferson wrote to Thomas Leiper in 1815:

"'The less we have to do with the amities or enmities of Europe the better.'

"A few years earlier, in 1795, Washington wrote to Governeur Morris that America's policy should ever be to 'maintain friendly terms with, but to be independent of, all nations on the earth.'

"In some quarters it is now the fashion to regard Washington and Jefferson as old fogys, fit to take part in the politics of their day, but not qualified to advise the big country we have become. Those who think thus need to be reminded that fundamental principles are not changed by an increase in census returns, and that it may be as dangerous for us to mix in European intrigues to-day as it was in Washington's time. The leagues and alliances of Europe often change more swiftly than the scenes in a kaleidoscope. The friends of to-day may be the foes of to-morrow.

"England, which dealt a deadly blow to France at Waterloo, soon after Waterloo fought by France's side in the Crimea; Russia, which joined hands with Germany to crush Napoleon, later joined hands with Napoleon's country to crush Germany, and then still later repudiated her alliance with France, raised the red flag, and now stands against the world. Italy, for 20 years Germany's ally, changed front overnight and lined up with Germany's foes. In 1912 Bulgaria and Serbia smote Turkey hip and thigh, but three years later Bulgaria, side by side with Turkey, moved against Serbia, her former ally!

"History repeats itself. Within a few years there may be an entire regrouping of the Old World nations. Russia and Germany may be drawn together. Japan may find it to her interest to line up with the power controlling Siberia. And who can say that China will not awake from her slumber and join hands with the people of her own race and color, the Japanese? When these things come to pass it will be a tragic day for America if she is then a member of a league that will obligate her to submit vital American questions to the decision of eight European and Asiatic gentlemen sitting in Geneva.

"Those who think the world has so changed as to make it necessary for us to look to Europe and Asia for protection overlook the lesson just taught Germany. But if a few timid Americans overlook that lesson, history will not follow their example. Europe's kings and potentates now know our power as they never knew it before. And not in this generation will one of them sink another American ship or murder another American citizen. Future protests against violation of American rights will not be thrown into the wastebasket, as William of Prussia threw the submarine notes of President Wilson. For the whole world now knows the might and majesty of this great Republic.

"And so, having accomplished what we set out to do, having thrashed the insolent autocracy which flouted us, sank our ships, and drowned our women and children, if we now leave Europe to settle her own affairs while we attend to ours on this side of the ocean, will not that be better alike for Europe and America? Problems await us not only at home but in States to the south of us all the way to the end of South America, and one need not be a pro-German in order to believe that the work cut out for America in the Western Hemisphere is a big enough job for any one nation. Speaking for myself, I confess I am earnestly opposed to fishing for trouble in European waters. And I am opposed to America accepting 'mandatories' for distant lands, such as Syria or Armenia.

WHAT DOES A MANDATORY REALLY MEAN?

"Fine phrases may conceal but they do not change facts, and the cold, costly fact is that acceptance of mandatories will impose upon the American people enormous losses in life and money. International mandates, international decrees do not enforce themselves. Fleets and armies are needed for that; and, in my judgment, if we adopt this policy we shall not only incur grievous burdens of taxes but we shall also sow seeds of discontent which may result in a harvest of radical agitation.

"It is one thing to ask men to leave home and fireside to cross the seas and fight a military empire that has sunk our ships and murdered our women and children. It will be a very different thing to ask men to cross the seas to do police duty in a foreign land whose affairs do not concern us, whose name is hardly known to us, whose people can by no possibility ever be a menace to us.

"We gave our sons freely, we submitted freely to a huge load of taxation, we denied ourselves many comforts of life so as to repel and punish Germany's brutal violation of our national rights. But if, instead of calling on men to fight such a foe for such a reason, the Washington Government goes into our homes, our workshops, our farms, our office buildings and says to our sons:

"'Take off that civilian suit. Don this uniform and cross the ocean. You must march over Syria's burning sands. You must fight in Bulgaria, perchance die in Armenia—not because America fears those countries. They do not threaten us, as Germany did; they are too weak ever to threaten us. But we are bound by treaty to police those countries and impose upon them our government.'

"If this be said, what will the answer be? Will not discontent reign in homes from which sons are snatched to fight in foreign lands, not to protect America, but for the sole benefit of those foreign lands? Will not a protest arise from the American people when they realize the terrible burden of taxation involved in that word 'mandatory'? The word may sound sweet, but it means that American blood and American money will be spent in trying to compose the quarrels and jealousies of Europe and Asia!

"Has America no problems of her own, that she should devote her time, her energies, her resources to policing distant lands? Without criticizing what has been done as a war measure, without disapproving the aid given during the war to struggling, war-worn peoples in Europe, is it not permissible to suggest that the time has come when a halt should be called to Uncle Sam's playing Santa Claus to foreign nations?

"When I think of the army of unemployed in America; of the tens of thousands of children forced by poverty to work in shops and mills, children who should be in school or in God's sunshine; of the deep mud through which American farmers haul their crops to railway stations; when I reflect that France has a hundred miles of rock roads to Missouri's one; that in my home State are swamp lands which might be reclaimed, but are not because we haven't the money to do it; when I think of the vast area of valley lands devastated almost annually by the flooding of the Mississippi River because we haven't the money to build levees; when I think that in the West there is a territory capable of affording comfort and happiness to millions of men, but which is an arid desert because we haven't money enough to build dams and dig irrigating canals—when I think of things like these it is difficult for me to understand how any well-informed man can look on America as a superstate, with no problems of its own, and with unlimited resources from which it can give freely to all the rest of the world.

"A league of nations which would preserve peace without impairing America's sovereignty, without obligating America to intervene in foreign wars, not if and when America thinks it her duty to intervene, but as she may be 'advised' to do by eight European and Asiatic gentlemen sitting around a table in Geneva, Switzerland—such a league might merit approval. But a league which excludes from the planning of its covenant such highly civilized countries as Holland, Norway, Sweden, and Switzerland, while admitting such countries as Haiti, Liberia, and Hedjaz, excites distrust to begin with. When a careful study of its articles reveals the fact that it is not a league to preserve peace but, on the contrary, is a league to project America into all of Europe's future wars, whether or not American interests and American duty are concerned—when that is proved to be the kind of league we are asked to accept, there must be this emphatic answer:

"America will stand true to the principles of Washington, of Jefferson, and of all her other Presidents down to and including the Woodrow Wilson of April 13, 1916, who said on that day:

"'God forbid that we should ever become directly or indirectly embrolled in quarrels not of our own choosing and that do not affect what we feel responsible to defend.'

"The Woodrow Wilson who said on May 16, 1914, at the unveiling of the John Barry statue:

"'We can not form alliances with those who are not going our way; and in our might and majesty and in the confidence and definiteness of our own purpose we need not and we should not form alliances with any nation in the world.'

"My countrymen, I conclude, as I began, with the reminder that America has grown great and powerful by following the wise advice of Washington—advice that has been given by every one of America's Presidents not excepting our present Chief Magistrate, for not until his return from a long sojourn among the potentates and prime ministers of Europe and Asia did President Wilson repudiate the principles that have made our country peaceful and powerful. Washington and Wilson—(up to 1916). Two great Presidents! Let us continue to stand on the splendid platform they constructed, and so perpetuate the glory and greatness of the American Republic."

President Wilson was reelected in 1916 on a platform denouncing the league of nations.

The following quotations are taken from Democratic campaign textbook of 1916, which was the official organ of the party:

"Gov. Glynn's speech sounds party's battle summons.

"* * * For the America of to-day and for the America of to-morrow, for the civilization of the present and for the civilization of the future, we must hold to the course that has made our Nation great; we must steer by the stars that guided our ship of state through the vicissitudes of a century.

"* * * What the people must determine through their suffrage is whether the course the country has pursued through this crucial period is to be continued; whether the principles that have been asserted as our national policy shall be indorsed or withdrawn.

"* * * The President of the United States stands to-day where stood the men who made America and saved America. * * *

"If Washington was right, if Jefferson was right, if Hamilton was right, if Lincoln was right, then the President of the United States is right to-day. * * *

"And whom, we ask, will the policy of our opponents (Republicans) satisfy, and for how long? Fighting for every degree of injury would mean perpetual war, and this is the policy of our opponents, deny it how they will. It would not allow the United States to keep the sword in the scabbard as long as there remains an unrighted wrong or an unsatisfied hope between the snowy wastes of Siberia and the jungled hills of Borneo. It would make America as dangerous to itself and others, as destructive and as uncontrollable as the cannon in Victor Hugo's tale of '93. It would give us a war abroad each time the fighting cock of the European weather vane shifted with the breeze. It would make America the cockpit of the world. It would mean the reversal of our traditional policy of government. * * * It would make all the other nations the wards of the United States and the United States the keeper of the world. What would become of the Monroe doctrine under such a policy? How long do our opponents suppose we would be allowed to meddle in European affairs while denying Europe the right to meddle in American affairs? The policy of our opponents is a dream. It never could be a possibility. It is not even advanced in good faith. * * * In a word this policy of our opponents would make the United States the policeman of Europe. Rome tried to be policeman of the world and went down. Portugal tried to be policeman of the world and went down. Spain tried and went down, and the United States proposed to profit by the experience of the ages and avoid ambitions whose reward is sorrow and whose crown is death * * *."

This reads like the speech of one of the men who has recently been denounced as a "contemptible quitter." Or like one of those who has been called "pygmy-minded." Or "a dream of a man living in a forgotten age."

As a matter of fact, it is the warp and woof of the Americanism plank of the platform upon which President Wilson was elected.

LETTER OF AUGUST 19, 1919, BY ED E. YATES, OF KANSAS CITY, MO., ON THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"No Democrat can, by any possibility, stand for the league pact and treaty.

"As a document it is distinctly un-American.

"The whole runs flat against the teachings of the fathers, who were never internationalists, but always Americans. Friendship for all, entangling alliances with none, is made to read friendship for some, entanglements world wide—national liberty surrendered and our engagements with foreign powers become the paramount thing in our national life.

"That is not all.

"It is inconceivable that any Democrat can condone, as he must if he indorses the league, every act of spoliation, every rape of peoples, territory, and liberty; every crime that has been committed in the name of civilization, with which the national life of our allies is replete. Yet he must do all these things if he goes in for article 10. If we stand pledged to maintain the status quo of nations, then logically the status quo is right, no matter how much larceny, blood, crime of high and low degree may have been involved in the origin of the thing. Moreover, it annihilates the dream of future freedom for peoples now under dominion of world powers; for how can tributary people or a colony—an underling nation—hope for national life without aggression of some sort from without? And is it not conceivable that such aggression might not only be meritorious, but conditions might impose an obligation to help it along which no liberty-loving citizen would desire to ignore. The wholesale condonation of the national crimes of some of our allies, it is hardly necessary to say, if carried to the conclusion where the advocates of the league of nations should be required to take it, would utterly repudiate the means by which American independence was obtained, as well as the beneficent results.

"Why abandon a national policy always followed that has given virility and esprit to our Republic at all times in favor of one of entanglement, a policy which spells emasculation for all national spirit? Really, to my mind, the only people who give a possibly plausible reason for support of the pact are the remnant of Mr. Wilson's old peace pact. They say, 'Let's try it; if it only averts a war in a decade, it will have benefited mankind immeasurably.' Just so! This reason looked at, however, falls little short of senility, for the kindergarten classes will naturally inquire, 'What greater reason have we to suppose that the league will avert war rather than produce it?' A historic, philosophic investigation of the probabilities of the matter, I think, would justify one in selling pools either way at practically the same price.

"Be this as it may, why should we, the richest, the most powerful, Nation in the world promise subservience to other powers in advance—'sight unseen,' as we used to say? There may be a reason, but to take up the vernacular, 'you may search me'!

"Shall we underwrite the present foreign territorial conditions to the full extent of our boy power and money resources? Mr. Wilson says, 'Yes.' But his reasons are wholly illogical, sentimental, dreamy, and, what is weightier than all, smack too much of Old World greed and selfishness and too little of that which has made us a Nation 'set apart.'

"Mr. Wilson, if he succeeds in this policy, should be deified as the god of fate, for he and his cult teach that world conditions should be left where chance has chucked them. Why should any strive or look up for better things; have not the fatalists headed by this new leader decreed that whatever is is right? So kick not against the pricks, but accept the lot fate has allotted and be thankful it is not worse. All islands and continents held in leash cry against so damnable a doctrine.

"This touches but one phase of the question."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona will state it.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not stirred by sentiments of envy at the applause these eloquent speeches bring out, but I appeal to Senators like Senator LODGE, Senator HITCHCOCK, and other men who are statesmen and leaders to assist in preserving order in the Senate. No one here could admire more than I do the courageous speech just made by the Senator from Missouri. Whether the occupants of the galleries agree with him or not, whether we agree with him or not, we are bound to agree that he enriches the annals of the Senate when he speaks. Would you, occupants of the galleries, go into the Supreme Court and there applaud a decision? You would not. Yet we are here called upon to pass upon a greater cause than the Supreme Court ever had under its jurisdiction. We are passing upon the destiny of nations and of men. [Manifestations of disapproval in the galleries.] I see that you do not even agree with these statements. I am simply saying this for the dignity and honor of the Senate. The debates on this subject are going to wax warm. Before this debate is concluded we are going to have scenes here that will call into requisition the coolest nerve of men in order that we may keep order. Let the occupants of the galleries help us. We need their assistance and we need the presiding officer's help. The occupants of the galleries are our guests; they are invited here; they should assist in preserving order.

I have said this much in the hope that the honor of the Senate may be maintained; for what demagogues may say outside and what men may do outside to intimidate a Senator, let there be here a serene atmosphere, unmoved and uninfluenced by the occupants of the galleries, who, I am sure, do not appreciate that it is against one of the oldest rules of the Senate to express approbation or disapprobation of the speakers.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in order that we may return to the serene and calm atmosphere described by the Senator from Arizona, I move, as in legislative session, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 23, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, September 22, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God our Heavenly Father, source of every blessing, we thank Thee for the preservation of our lives, a new day with its hopes and possibilities.

Cleanse us, we beseech Thee, from all guile. Imbue us plenteously with heavenly gifts, that we may hallow Thy name in all that we undertake. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, September 20, 1919, was read and approved.

AMENDMENT OF FOOD-CONTROL ACT.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, from the Committee on Rules, submits the following report:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred House resolution 304, submit a privileged report on said resolution with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

House resolution 304.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 8624, the same being "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, approved August 10, 1917,'" disagree to all Senate amendments, and send the same to conference without intervening motion or debate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the resolution is for the purpose of getting the bill amending the Lever Act to conference. This bill amending that act has been delayed for some time, and it is thought that in the interest of the public good the matter should be sent to conference at once. This resolution is to accomplish that purpose.

Unless there is request for further debate of the resolution by some one else, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would like to have about 45 minutes if I could get it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the rule that the committee has brought in probably is perfectly in keeping with the program, but I want again to call to the attention of the House the inconsistency of the procedure which we are undertaking.

The bill before us is "To provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel." That is applicable throughout the United States, and was reported by the Committee on Agriculture and passed both branches with various minor amendments. There was attached to the bill as a major amendment—because it is an absolutely separate and distinct proposition—what is known as the Ball Act, establishing in the District of Columbia a rent commission, applicable solely to the District of Columbia.

Now, I will not take up the time of the House to point out some of the defects in the Ball rent commission bill, but it is full of defects, as is acknowledged by its advocates in the other branch. We are told that the way to correct it is to send it to conference. The conferees are leading members of the Committee on Agriculture. We can perfect a bill, forsooth, establishing a rent commission in the District of Columbia by adding it as an amendment to a food bill, reported by the Committee on Agriculture, and refer this amendment to the agricultural conferees.

A great deal has been said at one time and another as to the defects of our system of placing riders on bills, and if the House saw fit and would accept this opportunity of expressing its dissatisfaction with that method of procedure, it would not adopt the rule which is now submitted by the Committee on Rules. We have a District of Columbia Committee. The distinguished chairman is sitting before us now, ready to deal with District matters.

The simplest thing in the world is to vote out this amendment, refer the Ball bill, if you wish, to the District Committee, let the District Committee hear it, and let it be considered on the floor of this House, and then take such action as we may see fit. The process that this rule makes possible is having a bill which has never been before the House, and which has never been considered by a committee of the House, and never debated on this floor, put onto a bill having nothing to do with the District of Columbia, having nothing to do with the establishment of a rent commission, and heard only by the conferees of the Committee on Agriculture.

If you can get a more inconsistent proposition than that before you in the way of the adoption of a rider, I do not know what it is. Therefore it seems to me that the right course of procedure is to consider the establishment of a rent commission in the District of Columbia purely on its own merits, not through the adoption of an amendment to an agricultural bill. It is the worst illustration of the so-called rider system that I have ever seen brought before the House in my term of service.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I want to ask the gentleman if the only way we can accomplish that now is to vote down the rule?

Mr. TREADWAY. I think that would be the proper method, to vote down the rule.

Mr. DENISON. If you can accomplish it in that way, I agree with the gentleman that we ought to vote the rule down.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am not shaping the procedure of the House, and therefore I do not advocate that procedure too strongly, but it does seem to me that that is the course to pursue.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I rise not to oppose the rule, but to call attention to the first line in the second paragraph of the food-control act, "By reason of the existence of a state of war." I want to call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that that is a statement that is not true. There is no "state of war," except upon paper. The terms of peace have been agreed upon, so far as our enemy is concerned. There is no "state of war," and if an opportunity should come I hope to see an amendment offered to strike out that declaration. The only "state of war" exists by reason of the fact that it is a paper "state of war" and the fact that our troops are being sent all over the world without any act of Congress and without any declaration of war.

Some of my colleagues may remember that during this session I have before called your attention to the fact that 4,000 of my constituents are in Siberia. They are there without a declaration of war. There is no declaration of war, and we have a statement of a Member of Congress to the effect that when he called upon the department as to the sending of our troops to Silesia he ascertained that 5,000 of our troops had been ordered to Silesia without any declaration of war. Our troops are being used all over the world as policemen and guards, and I have offered evidence here which shows that our troops are being employed as track laborers in Siberia.

I call attention to this fact because I intend on every possible occasion to do so whenever I can. There has been no declaration of war against Silesia. The department tried to conceal from the people and from the Congress the fact that these men were sent there. It was denied to our colleague, Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They stated to him that they did not intend to have it known, but the fact came through Coblenz, and that dispatch was published in this country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MASON. I would like one minute more, because I had to wait about that long for one or two gentlemen who were standing near me.

Mr. CANDLER. We would like to have some more time over here.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I can not yield any more time on this resolution. The purpose of it was not to provoke debate, but to get this very important bill into conference.

Mr. CANDLER. That is all I wanted to insist upon.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If gentlemen are interested in getting this necessary legislation passed, there is only one way to do it, and that is to put this bill into conference at once. Therefore I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. Those in favor of agreeing to the resolution will say "aye."

The affirmative vote was taken.

Mr. KNUTSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum, and therefore ask for a call of the House. I call for a division on the vote.

The SPEAKER. The motion would come on the division. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. GARD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. The negative vote has not been taken.

The SPEAKER. The ayes were called but not the nays. There is obviously no quorum present.

Mr. KNUTSON. I withdraw my point of no quorum and ask for a division.

Mr. WALSH. It is too late to withdraw the point now.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he has just stated that there is no quorum present, and that can not be withdrawn.

Mr. BLANTON. I was just going to make that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 257, nays 12, answered "present" 2, not voting 158, as follows:

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table under the rule just adopted the bill H. R. 8624, and disagree to all the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8624, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and send the same to conference without intervening motion or debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan, and Mr. RUBEY.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 8658 be changed from the District of Columbia to the Judiciary Committee. I will state that I have asked the chairmen of both committees and there is no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Reserving the right to object, I would like to hear a statement from the gentleman of what the bill is about.

Mr. GARD. What is the bill about?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8658) for the repeal of a certain joint resolution passed by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled.

Be it enacted, etc., That the joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, No. 21, approved February 28, 1899 (30 Stats. L., p. 1390), be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. There is some conflict between this joint resolution and another resolution which ought to be coordinated with the laws now being acted upon by the Judiciary Committee. I introduced the resolution.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, for the present I shall have to object.

ANNIE R. EMMONS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution 302, authorizing the usual payment of an amount equal to six months' salary and $250 to defray funeral expenses to the widow of a deceased employee of the House of Representatives, having had the same under consideration, find that Lucius H. Emmons was an employee of the House of Representatives on the soldiers' roll; that he died while an employee of the House; and that Annie R. Emmons is his lawful widow. It being the practice and custom of the House to so provide for the widow, the committee recommends the adoption of the resolution.

House resolution 302.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Annie R. Emmons, widow of Lucius H. Emmons, late an employee of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months of his compensation as such employee, and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray the expenses of the funeral of said Lucius H. Emmons.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for not exceeding 10 minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for not exceeding 10 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I trust that after the gentleman has proceeded for 10 minutes out of order he will take a few minutes to explain the purpose of the resolution, as there are one or two questions I desire to ask.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, on what subject does the gentleman desire to speak?

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I just want to submit a brief statement to the House upon the matter that was referred to on last legislative day here, respecting the telegraph bills of Members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, on Saturday last the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, having in charge the deficiency appropriation bill, made some reference to the telegraph bills of Members of the House. I was unfortunately absent at the time, and want now to impose upon your good nature and time for a few moments to correct any possible misapprehension that may exist because of those statements, and to express regret that I was not here to do it on Saturday. Although the Committee on Accounts is perhaps correctly charged with censoring these telegrams as to matter, their audit as to accuracy is clearly a matter solely for the audit department of the Treasury and not for the Committee on Accounts.

For some time—and I shall not say whether from the membership of the House or from outside—complaint has been made to the Committee on Accounts respecting this matter, and we, the committee, have been loath to take up the subject simply because of embarrassment that it might cause because of some unintentional and certainly unconscious abuses of the privilege. I want to present these figures, which I take from the clerk's report, which will give some idea of the necessity for the mention, and the mention alone. Whatever I have to say on the subject is not by way of criticism of any Member of the House or of the House as a whole. Such violations, if any there be, such abuses as have occurred, I repeat, in my own mind, have been highly exaggerated, and have been committed unintentionally, I am sure, and, more often than not, unconsciously.

In 1914 the bills permissible to be paid through congressional frank amounted to $19,430.18. The figures I give are for the fiscal years ending on the 30th of June. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, they amounted to $26,042.53. They commendably dropped at the end of the year ending June 30, 1916, to $11,919.02. In 1917 they amounted to $24,045.20. In 1918 they amounted to $44,814.46 and for 1919 they amounted to $108,947.53. There is great excuse for this seemingly unreasonable figure. There are many Members who have used their franks for cables abroad for the release of soldiers who were very sadly and badly needed at home because of bereavements, illness, and distress of their families, and I am bound to say that if the entire amount expended relieved the heart anguish of one single mother or brought home a single boy to his bereaved or distressed family every cent of it was well spent. [Applause.]

The abuse has not occurred in any respect, with very few exceptions, through the introduction of matter which was not within the purview of the privilege. That is to say, the amounts that I have given you have not been accumulated through direct abuse of the privilege enjoyed by Members of the House. They have not used the frank for extraneous purposes nearly so much as might have been imagined by many of us from the figures given, but we have, perhaps, become a little lax and, perhaps, have transgressed in the manner in which we have sent out cablegrams and telegrams. One might very well imagine that some Members were trying to fill the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by writing a speech in their telegrams. As an instance, we took occasion to see how a telegram might be deleted and altered, as it would naturally be done in the severe economy pursued in one's private interest in sending personal telegrams. This is a concrete instance of two cablegrams, which cost, respectively, $26.30 and $31.40.

We have figured out that they might have been sent for $6 and $8, respectively, without the slightest fear of having them in any way misleading to the one to whom they were addressed. Another feature that might be eliminated is the statement made by many Members "reply at my expense." They usually did that. Ample allowance was made to the Army and the Navy for all telegraphic purposes, and instead of their being charged to our personal expense they were, of course, charged to the House account. Wherever there has been opportunity for comparison between one department and another, the House always gets the worst of it.

The promiscuous use of the frank by secretaries is a thing that should be frowned upon and could be eliminated to a great extent. Many telegrams come in that are difficult of solution as to just to whom they belong and to whom they should be charged.

Mr. Speaker, I have never posed as a reformer, and I certainly am not an informer. I regard the humble position that I hold, and that of my associates on the Committee on Accounts, as a confidential relation with all the other Members. I do not at any time desire to divulge the contents of telegrams or cablegrams that have been sent. I have taken this matter up only generally with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and with him alone. The difficulty in the matter may in some way be appreciated by the membership when I tell you that I am informed that the Treasury Department, very excusably because of the onrush of business, is two years behind in its audit, and that it has taken three men a full week's time of consistent hard work to segregate the telegrams of the membership for the month of July only.

I have heard a great deal about economy from both sides of the House, and one side is just as great an offender as the other. Economy, like charity, might well begin at home. This is a matter that should not be disagreeably saddled upon the Committee on Accounts. It is a matter that each Member should see to himself and settle with himself, censoring his own wires, and thereby relieve us of further disagreeable duties in the performance of a most disagreeable position in the House.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS], who was referred to through an unprecedented typographical error as chairman of the Committee on Accounts—and I am sure that was a plain error, because I am positive he could not have been held so low in the estimation of his colleagues as to have been chairman of that committee—suggests a method by which these bills should be censored by the Committee on Accounts. It has been the effort of that committee not to ask you for additional clerical help, and we hope to get through with this matter without asking that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, may I proceed for five minutes more?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IRELAND. We hope to be able to handle this matter as well as we can ourselves and without additional assistance, but it is very tedious and very menial and very hard work. I have done some of it myself simply to familiarize myself with the situation, and I ask you sincerely to take this matter into your own hands and relieve the very delicate and disagreeable situation and responsibility entailed upon our committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think the chairman has made a very full and complete statement of the situation, and there is not anything I can think of that I can add to what has been stated. It is a very delicate situation. These telegrams do not reach the Committee on Accounts until some two or three months after they are sent. I might say in the chairman's time there is a very close twilight zone which creates a very delicate situation. It is difficult oftentimes for a Member to state whether the telegram comes strictly within the rule or not, and I want to join the chairman in asking the Members of the House to help us in this delicate situation.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that at the time he referred to the Government had control of the cables, so we were simply transferring the money from one pocket to another.

Mr. IRELAND. That did not cut down the bills, however, did it? I do not think the gentleman's suggestion is pertinent as a matter of economy.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to congratulate the gentleman upon the very frank and considerate statement he has made, and I would like to ask this question if he can answer it. Of course, I am not asking for any name whatever, but assuming that Members have likely made mistakes in the length of telegrams, or in the character of messages to which the gentleman referred, I want to ask this: Is there any marked difference in the amount charged to Members, $108,000, prorated fairly well among the 435 Members? In other words, does one Member run up a large amount of expense when the rest of us keep within bounds?

Mr. IRELAND. I will say to my good friend from Missouri that the majority of Members are within bounds, and I regret very much to say there is a material difference, and that is as far as I would like to go.

Mr. RUCKER. That is as far as I would want the gentleman to go. I think if some notice was given those of us who have, maybe without being conscious of it, used the wires excessively, it would put the brakes on.

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir. I hope that will be the case.

Mr. RUCKER. And relieve the gentleman of the embarrassment which he reports here.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. GARD. Does the Committee on Accounts, or anyone on the Committee on Accounts, audit these telegrams and cablegrams to determine whether they are official or whether they are personal?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; we are supposed to as to matter, but not as to the amount. As to the aggregate of the amount charged, that is supposed to be cared for by the Treasury Department.

Mr. GARD. I understand it is the business of the Committee on Accounts to determine whether the matter is official or unofficial?

Mr. IRELAND. I regret very much to say the gentleman is correct, and I am sorry it is.

Mr. GARD. Is the committee doing that?

Mr. IRELAND. We are. That is one thing we are endeavoring to correct, and I will say that the committee is doing its best to do its duty in the matter.

Mr. GARD. What is the course of the committee if after the audit you find the matter is unofficial?

Mr. IRELAND. The gentleman will remember that we have been in charge but a short time, and the matter has been so voluminous that we have only been able to segregate and catalogue one month. We will attend to it.

Mr. GARD. I realize the labor involved, but I wished to find out what has been done and the policy of the committee with reference to these unofficial telegrams?

Mr. IRELAND. That will be done.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. POU. Why should any of this material be kept confidential. It seems to me it ought to be given publicity. It is public business.

Mr. IRELAND. The gentleman is quite right possibly, but it would only involve us in accusations and recriminations which would come to no real purpose or good.

Mr. POU. I do not see why public business should be kept secret.

Mr. IRELAND. I want to emphasize the fact that alarming as the amount of these telegrams is in a majority of cases, generally the Members have complied with the law and there has been ample excuse for the increase in volume. I do also want to call attention to the fact that the humble chairman does most of this work for the committee in trying to relieve his colleagues of extra work and embarrassment, and I am a fairly modest man—that is, modest for a Congressman [laughter]—and I have no desire to poke my official nose into any gentleman's private business or his domestic affairs.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman have two minutes more time.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, well——

Mr. IRELAND. I am sorry.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thought the gentleman wanted some information about the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HASTINGS. Now, if the chairman will yield I will say that this resolution that is before us—I believe the gentleman wanted to make some explanation of the resolution that is before us.

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not require unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is all I ask.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. IRELAND. I yield.

Mr. PARRISH. In reply to the suggestion made by my colleague over at the left, I would say that those telegrams, under the direction of the chairman of the committee, are being segregated down in the office of the Committee on Accounts, and, as I understand it, there is no secrecy at all about them. They may be seen by anybody who desires to see them. I just simply wanted to make that statement so that the House would know there was no secrecy about it, that the public may know it; and, furthermore, the men who send those telegrams and who feel that they are treading upon questionable ground—and some of them have done that, although not so many, so far as I am advised, but some have done so—may know that the matter is being carefully investigated, and they may refrain from any further steps in that direction. I want to be absolutely fair with the House in every way, and at the same time protect the Public Treasury in that regard.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was very much interested in the statement the gentleman just made that he did not care to poke his official nose into private business. Does the gentleman regard the Committee on Accounts and these telegrams as private business?

Mr. IRELAND. The gentleman misunderstood me. I was referring to matter that might be contained in some of the wires of Members.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not the duty of the committee to sift out those telegrams that relate to personal business and make the Members pay for them, instead of leaving with the House the imputation that we are using telegraph franks for private business?

Mr. IRELAND. Is it in the gentleman's mind that I would do that? There was certainly no intentional imputation against the House or any Member.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the gentleman think it would be much more effective to call it to the attention of these individual Members who are abusing these franks than to call it to the attention of the House publicly? Would not that be more apt to correct the abuse?

Mr. IRELAND. I disagree with the gentleman. It would not result in the good we should try to reach.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the gentleman think the Members have enough discretion to know what is public and private, and if a Member does not make that distinction it is the chairman's business to call attention to it and correct it?

Mr. IRELAND. If we do that, we will do it privately, and not on the floor of the House.

As to the resolution under consideration, it is the usual resolution making provision for the widow of a deceased employee of the House. This employee was one of the doorkeepers on the soldiers' roll. It is the usual resolution, granting to her not to exceed $250 for funeral expenses and six months' salary of the employee. If there is no question regarding it, I will move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8078, known as the dyestuffs bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8078.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I want to say to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that I have requests for considerable more time than I expect to grant. I want to know how much time the gentleman from North Carolina wants to consume on that side of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. About as much as the gentleman's side will want to consume. I want to be fair. Will the general debate be confined to the bill? If so, we can save an hour or two. If not——

Mr. FORDNEY. With the exception of a very little debate. And if the gentleman will permit the matter to be confined to matters relating to import duties, with the exception of 30 minutes——

Mr. KITCHIN. We either ought to confine it to the bill or let it be open for general debate. The gentleman and myself in controlling the time ought to discourage as much as possible Members talking on other subjects.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will discourage debate, except on the bill, with the exception of 30 minutes on this side. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that one half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina and the other half by myself, and that general debate——

Mr. KITCHIN. How much would you say?

Mr. FORDNEY. Give me about three hours and a half on this side.

Mr. KITCHIN. Three hours and a half to the side?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Put it three hours.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman, if the Chair will pardon me, that I doubt very much, much as I dislike to trespass on the patience of the House, that I will be able to explain this bill, with the questions I expect to be asked, in less than an hour and a half.

Mr. KITCHIN. As you gentlemen are responsible for the facility with which it is to be passed, I yield.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate be limited to seven hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the debate be limited to seven hours, one half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8078, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 8078, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes."

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment to ask him a question before he begins the discussion?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. As I read it and understand it, there is considerable discord and contradiction in the various aggregations of letters found on page 3. Will the gentleman explain, define, and pronounce those words to us?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that in due time I will go thoroughly into that.

Gentlemen of the committee, at the outset I am going to make a rather novel request, that the Clerk in my time read the majority report. I do this because I think it is important that the House should get at least a bird's-eye view of the tremendous questions that are involved in this bill. The report is not long, and I think it covers practically the entire subject in a briefer and more succinct way than I could express it on the floor. I desire to have it read by the Clerk, because it is obvious that the condition of my voice is such that I do not desire to inflict either the House or myself with any more words than are absolutely necessary. So I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read in my time the majority report, and I ask that gentlemen may give attention, as it deals with a subject which I regard as of vital importance to this country.

The Clerk read as follows:

IMPORTATION OF COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred H. R. 8078, "A bill to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled 'An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes,'" having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House without amendment and recommend that the bill be passed.

This bill amends the present law in four important particulars. In its technical details it follows substantially the recommendations of the Tariff Commission in bringing the phraseology of the law up to date, so as to prevent evasions of its provisions through undervaluation or false designation of articles sought to be imported. Experience in the administration of the existing law has made it clear that it is not so worded as to completely give effect to the intent of Congress, and it is believed that these technical changes will fulfill that purpose. In the second place, it repeals that provision under which the specific duties shall be reduced at the rate of 20 per cent a year for five years. It increases the rates of duty from 15 per cent ad valorem and 2½ cents a pound on the intermediates to 40 per cent ad valorem and 6 cents a pound, and upon the finished product from 30 per cent ad valorem and 5 cents a pound to 45 per cent ad valorem and 7 cents a pound. Expert chemical opinion was unanimous that the rates of duty on the intermediates should be substantially the same as those upon the finished product. In the fourth place, the bill provides that for two years no foreign dyes can be imported except under a license granted by a board created in the bill.

The bill subdivides, as does the present law, the materials used in the dye industry into three classes—the crudes, the intermediates, and the finished product. The process of producing the crudes is comparatively simple, they being actually present in coal tar and only an isolation. Any country which like this has an abundant supply of cheap coal and a great steel industry requiring much coke has an unlimited supply of the raw material, and the crudes therefore require no protection. But with regard to the intermediates the situation is entirely different. Their production requires the most elaborate chemical processes, which can be carried out without the waste of a large proportion of the raw materials used only by men of the most profound chemical knowledge and long experience, and such men are not yet available in sufficient numbers in this country. Under these circumstances, therefore, it is apparent that this industry requires for the present at least a very high degree of protection.

All this is still more true of the finished product, which may take one of six different forms. By further chemical processes, in some cases very simple, these intermediates may be converted into dyes, perfumes, pharmaceuticals, tanning materials, high explosives like T. N. T. and picric acid, or into poison gas. As a class these finished products, requiring as they do further labor and skill of a class plentiful in Germany but still very scarce in this country, need a greater though not much greater measure of protection than do the so-called intermediates.

The remarkable interdependence of the dye and the explosive industry is well illustrated by the fact that once having obtained by a long series of elaborate chemical operations a certain intermediate, that intermediate may be converted by one very simple chemical change into sulphur black, one of the most widely used dyes, or into picric acid, one of the most important of high explosives. The technical knowledge and skill, the materials and the apparatus necessary to make high explosives as well, as poison gases and their antidotes are precisely what are to be found in any well-equipped dye works and nowhere else. A nation, therefore, which has a thoroughly complete dye industry capable of supplying its dye needs is always ready for a defensive or offensive war so far as the production of explosives and chemical gases are concerned. If, as seems likely, we are entering upon a period of international disarmament, the possession of such an industry becomes of infinite importance. In a world disarmed a nation possessing such a potential arsenal would be in a position to overwhelm any nation which had none and would be practically immune from attack.

An important, if not the most important, phase of this industry is its bearing upon the advancement of medical and industrial chemistry. It is the one industry which deals on a colossal scale with organic chemistry and it is upon organic chemistry that the progress of modern medicine rests. Salvarsan, for instance, was developed in a dye-works laboratory and is the first known certain cure for one of the most terrible scourges of humanity. It is confidently predicted that upon the further development of organic chemistry will rest the discovery of other cures for such devastating diseases as tuberculosis and even cancer.

This development rests upon the further development in this country of skilled research chemists, and it is only in a dye laboratory that large numbers of such chemists can find a livelihood. Accordingly, a well-developed dye industry in this country will furnish a tremendous reservoir of technically trained men and of scientific knowledge upon which the most important industries of the country may draw in time of peace and the Nation itself in time of war or of threatened war.

The economic importance of the industrial side of this question is illustrated by the fact that industries in this country producing nearly $3,000,000,000 worth of goods each year are absolutely dependent upon coal-tar dyes and industries producing as much more annually are indirectly dependent upon coal-tar dyes and kindred materials.

For many years before the war we had practically no dye industry in this country. Such dye works as we had were merely assembling plants for German materials and supplied only about one-tenth of the American market. Accordingly all the huge industries requiring dyestuffs were absolutely at the mercy of Germany, and could have been dealt a crushing blow by Germany at any time the German trust saw fit. That Germany realized this is illustrated by a dispatch sent on March 13, 1915, by Count von Bernstorff to his own Government, as follows:

"Serial No. 432 of March 13, 1915. It is reported to me by Hossenfelder, telegram No. 4, that the stock of dyes in this country is so small that by a German embargo about 4,000,000 American workmen might be thrown out of employment."

As a matter of fact, Germany early in 1915, by the withdrawal of her supplies of dyes, attempted to force this Government into hostile action against Great Britain, and if she had had the power to send her own textiles into this country she would have inflicted a blow upon our textile industry from which probably it would have never recovered.

The war forced upon America the building up of the dye industry, for a situation arose under which many industries came to a practical standstill, and even the Government itself was in danger of having to cease to function in many important branches. For instance, the difficulty of securing printers' ink, which was entirely dependent upon dyes, brought about a situation under which the closing of the Government Printing Office seemed imminent and the Bureau of Printing and Engraving was in most serious embarrassment. The dyes necessary for even cheap and necessary clothing jumped in price in some cases 5,000 per cent and in other cases were not procurable at all. Fortunately we had in this country an unlimited supply of the raw materials, and patriotic Americans in all branches of industry set to work to remedy the situation by making their own dyes.

Vast amounts of capital were risked, without any assurance that it would not in the end be a total loss, as no one could guess how long the war would last, and as a result to-day we have in this country a dye industry which, although it is a mere baby, is able to supply the country's needs in most essentials, and will undoubtedly be able to supply the missing colors if given a reasonable time to get surely on its feet.

Under such conditions it would seem impossible that any loyal American would not realize the absolute necessity of saving and fostering such an industry as this. Only three methods of legislative assistance have been suggested—a tariff, a tariff supplemented by an antidumping provision, and a tariff supplemented by a licensing system. Your committee believes that only the last of these methods would be effective, and has accordingly recommended its adoption.

The plan as provided in this bill is to form a licensing commission, its members to be designated by associations engaged in and representative of both the producing and consuming industries. This commission will have power to grant licenses for the importation of foreign dyes under certain conditions. It is positively commanded to grant licenses to any applicant to import any foreign dye which is not obtainable in this country from domestic sources, and any dye which, while made in this country, is not obtainable at a reasonable price, of good quality, and within a reasonable time. Thus absolute assurance is given any American consumer of dyes that he can at any time obtain the foreign product where the American industry is unable to supply on favorable terms. Conversely, it will absolutely exclude importation of dyes which are made in this country of satisfactory quality and at fair prices and insure the development and extension of the manufacture of those dyes. Furthermore, the applications for the importation of such dyes as are not made here will promptly stimulate our manufacturers to make the same dyes by showing that a strong demand exists for them, and will thus guide the industry into the development which is really required.

During the life of this system a substantial number of dyes not made in this country will no doubt be imported, and, as they will be subject to the rates of duty provided in this bill, will produce a very substantial revenue for the Government.

Your committee does not suggest a license system as a permanent governmental policy, but feels that nothing else can meet the present emergency. Accordingly your committee recommends the license plan, together with an increased tariff, because as soon as the peace treaty is ratified the new American dye industry will be exposed to competition from an adversary so powerful and so desperate that no practical rate of duty can offer any real defense. The whole huge German dye industry, capable at the time of supplying the entire demand of the world, was combined in 1916 into a single immense trust, organized on purpose to fight its way back to the former German world monopoly. The combination is even now enormously prosperous. Starting with assets of nearly half a billion dollars, invested in the empire's most remunerative industry, plants of the trust have been busy throughout the war making all Germany's poison gases, many of her munitions, and at the same time enough dyes to accumulate a reserve capable of flooding the market of this or any other country. Recent observers report that the working forces have been held together complete and intact throughout the war and since its cessation, and that one at least of the component companies has made large additions to plants since the armistice.

The resources of the trust are therefore colossal, its plants are so huge and organized for such vast production that unless it can regain most of its former world market half its equipment must lie idle and the other half run at low efficiency. It must then recover its world market or cease to exist as a profitable business. Even before the war, when its supremacy was uncontested, the German industry's competition was utterly unscrupulous. It practiced ruthlessly every form of corrupt and unfair competition known to commerce. What can be more certain, then, than that in the almost immediate future, when instead of a comfortable and safe supremacy it faces possible destruction, it will attack all competitors with reckless disregard of all considerations of business decency?

This attack, unless Congress acts very speedily, will be concentrated upon us. Great Britain, France, and Japan have protected their own Government-aided dye industries by license laws essentially similar to the one herein recommended. The market of the United States is therefore, except that of China, Germany's last opening. To penetrate it and destroy our domestic producers the trust will surely be glad to spend millions of its surplus. Not many millions would be needed. A very few adroitly used in practically giving away selected dyes would kill the business of even the strongest of our companies and leave us once more at the trust's mercy. Such an onslaught would be dangerous even if Germany's costs of production were as high as ours; but they are not. Even if the prices of labor and material are equal, an old dye industry can always undersell a new one. In making textiles or typewriters or paper or almost any other article that could be mentioned the maker gets practically all of his raw material back in finished product. In making dyes, however, some is lost in each of the many steps in the manufacture. How great each of these successive losses is depends on the experience of the manufacturer. The total of his successive losses when the work is done by an inexperienced man is enormous. We, now at the job, lose half our raw material as the work goes on. The Germans, who have been at it for 40 years, lose but a trifling proportion. Their costs are thus far below ours and are likely to remain so, though in a decreasing degree, for a long time. An attempt to meet under such conditions such an assault from such an adversary would require unheard of tariff rates, and it is highly probable that by undervaluation, rebates, and concessions, coupled with the old German method of full-line forcing and bribery, the German trust could nullify their effect.

No antidumping law yet suggested seems at all likely to meet the conditions in this particular industry on account of its immense complexity and the ease with which imports can be camouflaged by the skilled and unscrupulous German chemist. It is apparent, then, that any tariff bill which could possibly become law might, and, indeed, probably would, fail to insure the development of this industry, which is so essential to our national defense and well-being. It is equally clear that the proposed license plan, faithfully administered, will certainly furnish the necessary protection and that, too, without sacrificing revenue. Your committee believes that the industry is too important to be risked, and therefore recommends the adoption of this certain though unusual means of defense. Your committee makes this recommendation also as the only suitable answer to the similar British, French, and Japanese license laws. Those laws keep the competition of our dyes out of Great Britain, France, and Japan. Your committee does not believe that we should aid in building up their new subsidized industries by giving them at the expense of our producers, unlimited access to our market. When by this simple expedient we can at the same time make sure of obtaining every foreign product we need and of building up our own vitally important industry, we feel that Congress ought not to hesitate or rest content with any doubtful remedy.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I really must apologize for having had read so long and so complicated a report as this. But I desire to bring before your minds en bloc, as it were, the situation that faces the country to-day in regard to these coal-tar chemicals.

The report shows, in the first place, the intimate relation that exists not only between the dyes and explosives, which most of us knew before, but the intimate relation which also exists between these and many other articles such as the modern chemical and poison gases, and above all, medicinal preparations; for, gentlemen, to-day most of the great cures that are being developed for the most dangerous ills and diseases that afflict the people of this country are the direct result of experiments in organic chemistry, which can only be made in a dye works.

Thus this matter is of importance, and vital importance, to the country, not only from the business standpoint but from the purely national standpoint as well. And it will be my particular object to endeavor to impress upon you the need not only for action, but for speedy action, lest our present industry shall absolutely vanish from the face of the earth.

Before proceeding to any extended argument as to why this legislation should be enacted, I will take up the bill section by section and endeavor to explain its provisions, with a view of indicating just what it provides.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. As to this commission that is proposed to be created, are their actions subject to any review by any higher authority?

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will postpone his question until I come to that phase of the subject, I will go into it very fully, and I think I can explain to the satisfaction of the gentleman exactly what the powers of this commission are and that they are not excessive.

In the first place, allow me to say, gentlemen, that this is the third bill dealing with this subject that I have introduced in this Congress. The first bill, House bill No. 2706, dealt only with the tariff phase of this situation. It did not contain that provision which is now contained in the present bill in relation to a regulation of imports through a license system. It only went so far as the present law on the general subject and only changed that law in certain technical details and in the amount of duties to be placed upon these products. But the next bill, House bill No. 6495, contained this so-called license-system provision, not exactly as it is now, because it gave the commission considerably greater powers than are given in this bill. The so-called license system in this bill is the result of long and serious deliberation by the committee on the question of just how far we ought to go in giving any board the right of regulation of importations, and when I come to that portion of the bill I shall elaborate a little more extensively on that subject.

Up to page 9 of the bill before you, gentlemen, there are no changes of policy over the present law except in certain particulars which I shall enumerate. Generally speaking, this bill carries out the suggestions of the Tariff Commission for bringing the law up to date and preventing the evasion both of its letter and spirit that have gone on since the enactment of the present law. The Tariff Commission has given long and exhaustive consideration to this matter and recommends a number of technical changes in order to prevent violations of the law by all sorts of camouflage methods, of which the Germans are masters, in concealing the exact nature of the object sought to be imported.

In the first place, in the present law no items of the existing tariff law are repealed, and it has caused some confusion because these coal-tar chemicals are so infinitely varied in character that the merest change of substance or the merest technicality in construction of the customs law might shift them over under the general tariff law where the duty is very slight, and thus avoiding the intent of Congress in dealing with coal-tar chemicals as a class.

Another possibility of evasion results from the fact that dyestuffs can be brought in in various states of concentration, thus entirely changing the identity or character of the article. The object of the recommendation of the Tariff Commission is to make the provisions of the law very clear in that regard.

This bill divides the materials, as does the present law, into three groups; what are called the crudes, the intermediates, the finished product. With regard to the first group, the so-called crudes, they still remain on the free list with some additions. No country in the world, gentlemen, is so blessed as is this country in the possession of the raw materials for making all coal-tar chemical products, whether they be dyes, medicines, gases, or high explosives, because we have an unlimited supply of coal, and a practically unlimited demand for coke, owing to our enormous steel industry.

And it is in the process of making coke for the steel industry and other coke consumers that all these substances are derived. For years in this country, when we made our coke in the so-called beehive coke oven, practically all of these materials went up in smoke, and until the by-product coke oven came into being we were wasting at least 90 per cent of the product, all of which is practically saved now, and goes into the production of coal tar and these other so-called crudes. There can be no better way, I think, of conserving the resources of this country than to develop in the greatest possible degree the use of the by-products of the coke oven.

The industry in many of these substances has developed enormously since the war began. Take, for instance, benzol and toluol, two of the main bases of both explosives and dyes. The production of benzol has increased from $3,000,000 in 1914 to more than $55,000,000 in 1918, and the production of toluol has increased from $600,000 in 1914 to more than $14,500,000 in 1918. It is a most healthy indication of the progress of this vital industry, and for the reason that there is practically no competition in this industry from other countries, certainly none now, it seems proper that these products should remain upon the free list as they now are.

We now come to group 2, which consists of what are generally known as the intermediates, or, as the Germans call them, the derivatives. You will see on page 3 of this bill a list of jawbreaking names. These are the final chemical refinements of the raw materials that I have just been speaking of, like benzol and totuol, to the stage when you decide what you are going to make out of them. You can make dyes with them, you can make synthetic tanning materials, you can make perfumery, you can make poison gas, you can make T. N. T., or any other form of high explosive. Their production requires very complicated chemical processes. The distinctive feature of the dyestuff industry is that it is really a combination of thousands and thousands of different industries. Practically no two processes are the same. These materials go through a large number of chemical changes, each of which may destroy the identity of the previous article. So you have no opportunity of judging, as you can in most industries, how much you are going to get out of your original raw product.

If you make a steel rail you know approximately how many tons of steel are going into that rail, but if you make a dye you have not the remotest idea how much of your original product will appear in that dye. That is one of the reasons why Germany is so immensely ahead of this country in the making of these materials; not only because her labor cost is very much less, but because by reason of her tremendous chemical staff and her long experience in the matter of these materials she gets an infinitely larger yield from the component materials than we do. For instance, in turning one of these intermediates into a finished dye a skilled German chemist will ordinarily get a yield of about 80 per cent, while even our very best chemists very seldom succeed in getting more than 40 per cent, for lack of practical experience, and we are still under tremendous disadvantage in competing with Germany to-day, not only with regard to our very much higher labor cost but in regard to our less well-developed chemical efficiency.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUSTED. How does this bill protect against newly invented intermediates which may accomplish the purposes now accomplished by the intermediates specifically enumerated in this section?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The only possible way of preventing the flooding of the market with them during the next two years is the so-called license system as contained in this bill.

Now, although many of the materials mentioned on page 2 are difficult to pronounce, as a matter of fact, if you will examine them, you will see they are very simple. Each name represents a grouping of the principal substances which have gone into the product.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman mind trying to pronounce and giving us the meaning of the last word in line 3, on page 4?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman that I have a very bad throat to-day and was advised by my physician not to try to pronounce any of these names [laughter], but merely to explain what they consist of.

Mr. LAYTON. I will pronounce that word if the gentleman wants me to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will be very glad if the gentleman will do so.

Mr. LAYTON. Tol-u-y-le-ne-di'-a-min. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is exactly the way I should have pronounced it if my throat had been in better condition. [Laughter.] It is a common custom in this body to call a bill after its author, and if there happens to be more than one author the bill is sometimes known by the names of its other authors, like the Payne-Aldrich law or the Esch-Townsend law. Occasionally we hear of a bill with the names of three authors. For instance, if the gentleman from North Carolina, my distinguished friend Mr. KITCHIN, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. GARNER, should collaborate, each furnishing certain materials for a revenue bill, that bill would probably be known as the Kitchin-Rainey-Garner bill, which might look queer if spelled out in one word as some of the materials in this bill are. And if they were joined by the other gentleman from Texas, Mr. BLANTON, and his name added, the word would be even more difficult of pronouncement, and certainly the combination would seem to be about as difficult of amalgamation as some of the jawbreakers comprised in this bill. [Laughter.]

With regard to the tariff duties on the substances enumerated in group 2 of these intermediates we have made a substantial change. Under the present law these substances are dutiable at 15 per cent ad valorem and 2½ cents a pound.

As a matter of fact, their manufacture is practically as expensive as the manufacture of the finished dye. There are few processes involved in the turning of these materials into the finished dye and they are comparatively inexpensive, so the committee following expert opinion, which seemed unanimous upon the propostion that duties on the intermediates should be substantially as high as upon the finished dye, has made a much larger relative increase in the intermediates than in the finished dyes.

In this bill, instead of being 15 per cent ad valorem and 2½ cents a pound, the duties are 40 per cent ad valorem and 6 cents a pound. That seems a large increase, but let me quote to you some German authority for the necessity of a high protection on intermediates if we desire to retain them as an industry in this country, and retain them we must if we are to have an industry which can produce dyes, medicinals, chemical gasses, and explosives.

I read from a report submited to Count von Bernstorff on January 26, 1917, by Dr. Hugo Schweitser, who was the German expert in this country on this question, the "derivatives" he refers to being what we call "intermediates":

> The manufacture of the derivatives offers much greater difficulties for an industry still in the process of development for the reason that such an incredibly large variety of products is necessary. In a well-developed industry like that of the German a technical use is found in the end for all these products. In a less well-developed industry and in an industry which is only in the process of development, great hindrances stand in the way of the utilization of these derivatives.

He says further:

> The manufacture of derivatives stands in Germany on such an incredibly high plane that the prices for the manufactured articles are very low. It would take American industry many, many years before the same, even if it will ever be possible at all, could produce these derivatives as cheaply as German industry does. In order to show these differences of price, the following examples may be cited: * * *

Further on he says:

> The history of American tariff legislation has shown that, in general, a protective tariff of 30 per cent ad valorem does not afford sufficient protection to create an American industry.

So you see, gentlemen, that unless we provide a very substantial increase in duties over and above what they are now, to the producers of these intermediates, we might as well throw up our hands, because Germany will immediately take the entire business.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman seems to give a great deal of credence to the German opinion of reports made to Count von Bernstorff. In view of the fact that those distinguished gentlemen were so badly fooled about matters in America in the recent emergency, can not the gentleman from Ohio take these reports with a little grain of salt?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not such a report as this. Dr. Schweitzer was not romancing; there is no question about that; the Germans were not going about exploiting the American industry by any means. This was a confidential report, and you can be pretty sure that the exact truth was told with relation to the tremendous advantage that Germany had over us in this particular regard. And so, gentlemen, we have increased the duties very largely in this second group.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. With pleasure.

Mr. CALDWELL. I have received a large number, running into the dozens, of letters from manufacturers who are protesting against this bill. I wondered whether the gentleman could tell the House whether the protesting manufacturers have had an opportunity to be heard, and if they have, why is not their protest a good one?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman that there is a propaganda going on to-day in this country in opposition to this bill. I do not want to say that it is a propaganda induced by purely selfish motives of those engaged in promoting the German dye industry in this country. I will show a little later on that some persons are protesting against this bill who have been for years protesting against any legislation assisting the American chemical industry at all. They protested against any increased duties under the Payne law. The very same persons are opposing this bill, and they may have been able to pull the wool over the eyes of perfectly bona fide manufacturers.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will say that none of the parties whom I have known, who have written me letters, can by any far cry be said to be pro-German. I do not believe that a single one is a Democrat; they are all Republicans.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I, of course, concede that; but I say that their protest may be the result of propaganda. I do not assert that it is, and I cast not the slightest possible reflection on the patriotism of any one of the gentleman's correspondents. I think they have been unduly alarmed, as for years textile manufacturers have been unduly alarmed as to the possibility of not being able to get dyes necessary to their business and under the impression stimulated by certain propagandists that America can not make them under any circumstances.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROSE. I would like to say, along the line of the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], that I have received dozens of protests and suggestions about this bill that have come from men who I know have no connection whatever with any German propaganda. I regret that some of them are not here to listen to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has said about the report made to Count von Bernstorff. He has made the assertion that the Germans are in a position to make these dyes at a much less cost than we can make them in this country, and the man making the report gives an estimate of the cost of producing the dyes in this country and claims that this country is unable to produce them at the low cost which obtains in Germany. If that is true, then it seems to me that the protests against the passage of this bill would fall to a very great extent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am delighted that the gentleman from Pennsylvania feels as he does. Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen will postpone their questions on this particular feature until I have an opportunity to finally explain the so-called license system and its necessity I shall be glad, because I think I can show that such protests as come from bona fide manufacturers—and mind you, I am not saying for a moment that any protests sent by an American manufacturer of textiles against the passage of this bill is otherwise than absolutely bona fide—will be found to have been induced, whether they realized it or not, by certain propaganda sent out by persons who have for many years been interested in the importation of German dyestuffs into this country.

In the case of the finished dyes and all of the finished products of coal tar we have increased the duty from the present rate of 30 per cent and 5 cents a pound to 45 per cent and 7 cents a pound.

We have made another vital change—or, at least, a very important change—in the present law with regard to a certain group of materials which are specifically exempted from the duties in the present law, and I read further from the report of Dr. Schweitzer to His Excellency Count von Bernstorff, commenting on the existing law. He says:

> Happily, the following dyes are excluded from this specific duty: "Except natural and synthetic alizarin, and dyes obtained from alizarin, anthracene, and carbazol; natural and synthetic indigo and all indigoids, whether or not obtained from indigo, and medicinals, and flavors." This exception may well become the sheet anchor of the German industry. The dyestuffs which are excepted from this specific duty are the so-called vat dyes, and these vat dyes are a comparatively modern achievement of the German dye technique and are in general regarded as the most genuine dyes.

In other words, in the present law those dyes are specifically exempted, dyes in the manufacture of which Germany stands supreme, and in which we have to-day practically no industry whatever. They are the fastest of all dyes for certain purposes, and are used in dying certain classes of cotton goods. In this bill they are restored to the dutiable list and pay the same duty as all other finished dyes, thereby destroying what Dr. Schweitzer calls Germany's "sheet anchor." With regard to the possibility of the manufacture of this class of dyes in this country—and there are practically none manufactured to-day—Dr. Jones, the chemical expert of the Tariff Commission, says, on page 12 of the hearings, speaking of the so-called vat dyes:

> There is, however, no question that these dyes will be produced within a short time, provided the companies feel that they have sufficient protection to justify them in making the necessary additional investments required.

Under this bill, if you pass it as it is, we may hope to have added to American production the only portion of the dye industry which is to-day absolutely lacking.

Another important change was made. Under the present law the provision is that five years after its enactment the specific duties proposed in the law shall be decreased by 20 per cent a year, so that after five years they cease altogether. A further provision is that if five years after the passage of the law the President determines that at least 60 per cent of our total consumption is not being produced in this country these specific duties shall no longer be levied or collected, but go on the free list. Both these provisions are eliminated in this bill.

We come now to the so-called license system, the provisions of which I shall endeavor to explain and a little later try to show that it is absolutely necessary for at least two years to make some such provision as this, because no rate of duty, no matter how high, could meet the situation that to-day confronts us.

Section 503 (a) of the bill provides that for the next two years no dyes or other coal-tar chemicals mentioned in the bill can be imported except under a license granted by a commission formed for that purpose. The commission is to consist of 11 men, 10 of them engaged either in producing or consuming dyes, and 1, the chairman, a man not connected with any business either producing or consuming dyes. The members are to be chosen by the industries themselves and their names certified to the Secretary of the Treasury, and they thereupon shall receive their appointment. It will be observed that under this present bill there are six consumers and four producers of dyes on the board, so that it is to be assumed that all points of difference, if such exist, in case of any applications would be decided in favor of the American consumer rather than the American producer.

Mr. YATES. Eleven all together?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes. The 10 appointed by the various associations meet and elect a chairman, the chairman to be the only salaried member of the commission, and the commission is authorized to charge a small license fee in order to pay all expenses. So that there will be no expense attached to the creation or functioning of this commission, so far as the Treasury is concerned. The powers of the commission are simply these: Wherever an application is made to them by any American consumer to import German, English, Swiss, or French, or other dyes, a license must automatically issue if the fact is that that dye is not produced in this country or can not be obtained at a reasonable price. The fear expressed by some textile manufacturers that discrimination might be exercised in favor of some and against others is not warranted because that power is not lodged in the commission. They are commanded to issue licenses in every case where the fact is that these dyestuffs can not be procured within a reasonable time and for a reasonable sum in this country.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. Speaking of this commission, it states on page 11 that they are allowed to issue this license "on such products only as may be unobtainable from domestic sources on reasonable terms as to price, quality, and delivery." Now, presuming this commission grants a license on the import of some dyes which come under this item here, of course those dyes coming under that item will pay the duty that is already established in other parts of this bill. Is that so?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. It merely gives the right to bring those dyes in, and it does not abrogate the duty on those dyes?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Absolutely not. And for that reason, gentlemen, for the two years that this license commission plan is in force it is expected that this bill will produce a very handsome revenue. All vat dyes for the time being will have to be imported. They are not produced here, and a license will automatically issue. They will bear the increased rate of duty provided in this bill and a large revenue will be derived. Another advantage will no doubt result. The mere demand, the mere application for a license to import a certain dye is constructive notice to the chemists and manufacturers of this country that there exists in this country a demand for that dye, and undoubtedly research work will at once begin in the direction of its production here. Because of that you can safely count that if for the next two years you give them a fair chance our producers will be able to show that we can make our own dyes here at home with American capital and with American labor and say to Germany "We do not need you." [Applause.]

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. DEWALT. I notice in this provision on page 11 that the wording, in line 18, is this:

> Domestic manufacture, such of the products covered by section 503 (a) of this act, and such products only, as may be unobtainable from domestic sources on reasonable terms at the price, quality, and delivery.

Now, am I right in construing that to mean this, that this commission of 11, appointed, I believe, by the President——

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; they are appointed by the associations themselves.

Mr. DEWALT. This committee, appointed by these various associations, are also the judges as to the reasonableness of the price and of the quality and of the delivery?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I think the gentleman——

Mr. BUTLER. That is what I want to know.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will read that whole section and pay particular attention to the use of the word "shall," in line 16——

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It says "shall issue licenses"——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield 30 minutes additional to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And if the gentleman will also read the last paragraph—

> Nothing herein contained shall authorize the commission to refuse a license to a manufacturer, person, or agent to import for actual use by the manufacturer foreign dye when such domestic dye of equal quality is not immediately available for his use.

He will see that it is not a price-fixing commission by any means. The commission's hands are tied where a dye is not produced in this country or can not be delivered in a reasonable time. They must grant a license.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield for one question more?

Mr. LONGWORTH. With pleasure.

Mr. DEWALT. Conceding that the licensing commission shall issue, that is imperative; but notwithstanding that, is not that imperative order to issue that dependent upon these things, namely, when unobtainable from domestic sources on reasonable terms and as to price, quality, and delivery? Now, does not that import that there is some judgment there, and by whom is that judgment to be exercised as to price, quality, and delivery? And the question is, Is that judgment reposed in this commission?

Mr. LONGWORTH. My construction of that section is this, that exercise of discretion would not extend to a case where the dye could not be secured at all. In a case where the dye was produced here, but could not be secured in a reasonable time and for a reasonable price, some exercise of discretion might lie, but it would tend to be exercised for the benefit of the American consumer, for, mind you, a majority of this commission are manufacturers themselves, they are not producers of dyes.

Mr. DEWALT. They are the men who use the dyes?

Mr. LONGWORTH. They are the men who use them. They always have the majority, and should a question arise such as is suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania it is to be assumed that the textile manufacturers, the men who consume the dyes, are going to see to it that men in the same business receive fair treatment. I can not think of a case where any unfair discrimination could be used against the American consumer.

Mr. DEWALT. One question further.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will yield to the gentleman, but I would like to proceed.

Mr. DEWALT. Could this be met with an antidumping clause?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am coming to that. I will say briefly that in my judgment no antidumping clause could be framed that would help out in the situation that immediately confronts us, no matter how strong it was.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman permit one question there? In the first part of his speech I interrupted him and asked a question as to whether or not the decision of this commission, under the term "reasonableness" is subject to a review by any court?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; it is final, but, as a matter of fact, I can not conceive how, if a bona fide American consumer of dyes asks a license to import dyes after this bill is passed, it could be by any possibility refused to him if he could not procure those dyes here under reasonable terms and immediately.

Let me call your attention to this fact, too, gentlemen. Under the present regulations which provide that the War Trade Board shall issue licenses—as they have absolute authority to do—licenses have been granted within the last 10 days to import the next six months' supply of all necessary dyes. They have given licenses to everybody who applied for permission to import the dyes not produced here, and, I am told, though I have not seen the final figures, that the amount asked for is relatively insignificant, showing conclusively that America can produce practically all the dyes, except some of these specialties like vat dyes, that are necessary for American consumption at the present time.

Now, the commission proposed in this bill has a very much lesser authority than that now exercised by the War Trade Board.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUSTED. I am very much interested in the success of this proposition, and I want to see the bill meet every situation. I do not see how your licensing provision protects you under its language against the importation of newly invented German derivatives, for example, or newly invented dyes which have not been specifically enumerated, because your language distinctly says that your commission must grant a license where the dyes or derivatives are not manufactured in this country. Assume that in Germany they develop a lot of derivatives under different names by changing the process slightly, and those derivatives will accomplish the same purpose as the derivatives specifically enumerated in this bill, how does your licensing provision stop Germany from flooding our market with those derivatives that are not enumerated?

Mr. LONGWORTH. It would not prevent the importation of a given quantity if any bona fide American needed it for his own use and could not get it here. But it is not to be assumed that there will be a flood of importations, because we are to-day able to produce probably four-fifths of the American demand. I believe the average demand of the American market has run for a good many years at about 900 different colors, and we are now producing in this country about 400. At any rate, the fact is we are able, in most of the basic dyes, to supply the American demand to-day. The trouble would be that, without this licensing system, and under a tariff only, no matter how high, the accumulated stores of Germany would be dumped here regardless of cost. The immediate object of Germany is not to sell dyes for the next year or so in this country at a profit. They will be willing to give them away if only they can destroy the American chemical industry, the baby industry which was created by this war, and then they can sell their dyes and dyestuffs when American competition is removed, as they did before, at any profit they may see fit.

Mr. DEWALT. Possibly by yielding we can get the information more succinctly than we can in any other way. What I would like to know is this: This is not considered as a war measure, is it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman, when he asks that question——

Mr. DEWALT. It was not in the minds of the framers of this bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. In my opinion it is a necessary war measure, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say a necessary measure for war preparedness. Now, if the gentleman will let me go on——

Mr. DEWALT. All right.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So far I have been speaking mainly of the business side of this question, but as a matter of fact I subordinate it entirely to the national side.

The outstanding feature of this whole question is that it has two distinct sides, a business side and a national side, a peace side and a war side.

On the business side we find in this country an industrial production of $3,000,000,000 a year directly dependent upon dyestuffs and as much more dependent indirectly. On the national side we find that not only are we dependent upon dyestuffs for certain absolutely necessary materials for war, either defensive or offensive, like explosives and poison gases, but for many modern medicinal preparations in which the health of the community is bound up irrevocably. It is this mutual interdependence of these two widely different branches of human endeavor upon one industry which makes its study so fascinating and its importance to the Nation so vital. It is this that has caused one like myself, for instance, who has no practical skill in or erudite knowledge of chemistry to interest himself, as I have for the past four years, in endeavoring to bring it about that this country shall have a well-developed and permanent coal-tar chemical industry, sufficient at the very least to supply the needs of the American people both in time of peace and in time of war, and to for all time obviate the necessity that we should be dependent upon Germany or any other country for that which is vital not only to the welfare of the American people but to the safety of the Nation itself.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I think I understood the gentleman to say that we had not been and were not now able to produce the vat dyes. What is the explanation of that, since there has been practically inhibition against free importation for the past two years, or during the war?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Because they are a comparatively recent development, and our chemists have not learned how to make them. We now have all the German patents. We did not know the methods before. It is certain if you will give our men two years they will make them all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think there is a slight misunderstanding on the part of the gentleman from Nebraska. These dyes are for coloring certain materials like cotton.

Mr. LONGWORTH. They are not used in clothing at all.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Were not our manufacturers permitted to use those patents during the war period?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not at the beginning. We never got hold of them until quite recently. The Government has acquired all the German patents in this country, and it is only very recently that our chemists have had access to them.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I wish, gentlemen, to go on.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Just a question along that line.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Very well.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Will the gentleman state what our manufacturers have been using in place of these vat dyes during the war, when the German dyes were inhibited from being used?

Mr. LONGWORTH. They have had a hard time getting any, and that is the reason why our big textile manufacturers, almost to a man, who first opposed this legislation, are now for it, because when they were cut off from the German dyes and we had no industry of that kind in this country they were in great embarrassment, and they want at all hazards to avoid it again.

If this question had only its business side my interest in it would be far less intense than it is. In fact, I might hesitate to advocate any method outside of the protective tariff for a solution of the difficulty. But when I look upon the national side, both as it relates to the national defense and to the health and happiness of the people of America, I say to you with deliberate conviction that the need for this legislation is vital, and that this bill, notwithstanding the novelty of some of its features, ought to be passed substantially unamended.

In taking up the business side of this question I want first to very briefly review the history of the dye industry in the United States. Up to the 1st of August, 1914, it was an industry of practically no importance whatever. Congress every now and then had made spasmodic efforts to do something for it, but without any real success. The big textile manufacturers were almost a unit in opposition to any substantial increase in tariff duties on dyes and dye materials, as were, of course, the professional dye importers, almost all of whom were agents of the German trusts, and every effort was used to induce the belief that it was impossible for us ever to compete with Germany. Most of the concerns which produced dyes at all in this country were mere assemblying plants for German materials, and there were only two or three, like Schoolkopf Co., at Buffalo, and the Beckers Co., in Brooklyn, who really made dyes. At best, our industry produced only about a dozen different colors, out of the eight or nine hundred odd used in the American market, and was supplying only about 10 per cent of the American demand.

On the other hand, Germany controlled close to 90 per cent of the American market, in addition to being in practical control of the dye market of the world. As against the American production of some dozen or so different colors Germany produced in one concern alone more than 11,000 different colors.

Under these circumstances it is not difficult to imagine what happened here when the regular German supply was suddenly shut off. When Great Britain and the Allies assumed control of the seas, dyes in common use shot up by thousands per cent, and many of them were unobtainable at any price. Not only the consuming public but the Government found itself in serious embarrassment, for lack of colored inks used in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving and other bureaus.

Here is an example—and I take this from a very large number of cases that came to my attention when I was advocating the passage of the so-called Hill bill, which was in substance the present law but with a higher rate of duty. We had hundreds of instances submitted to us of the tremendous increase in the price of dyes in this country, and I am now going to read you this letter, received from a manufacturer of cotton:

NEW YORK, February 23, 1916.

Mr. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
Room 319, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have just read the copy of Congressman HILL'S speech before Congress on the dyestuff bill, H. R. 702, and on page 11 I read that yourself and Mr. HILL discussed the writer's statement before the Ways and Means Committee regarding our recent dyestuff purchases in China.

In order to have the matter entirely correct in your mind, I would say that you will find, on page 119 of the printed hearing before the Ways and Means Committee on the dyestuff bill, that the writer answered your question as to exorbitant cost of dyestuffs, stating that my company had just paid $5.75 a pound for aniline black (made by Badische, in Germany), which we had purchased from China.

These identical goods in normal times would have cost us 20 cents per pound, or a total of $1,748, whereas we are now compelled to pay more than $52,000.

Since that time we have made another purchase of same goods from Shanghai, paying $7.50 per pound instead of $5.75, and on February 14 last we were quoted $12 a pound for exactly the same material from China.

This latest quotation means an advance of 6,000 per cent over the normal before-the-war figure of 20 cents per pound.

Yours, very truly,

R. H. COMEY CO.,
GEO. W. WILKIE,
For the Company.

In other words, here was a manufacturer of cheap cotton goods who, for goods that had cost him before the war 20 cents a pound, had to pay $12, for the reason that we had no industry of that kind in this country. We had never built it up and had allowed Germany to control our own markets. Of course, something was bound to happen the moment Germany was unable to ship her goods in.

Here was an instance of goods shooting up in a few months over 6,000 per cent. There are cases where they shot up 10,000 per cent, and in many cases the dyes were not obtainable at all, textile mills were shutting down, and Germany knew what the situation was. You remember in the report the telegram of Hossenfelder, the German consul in New York, to Bernstorff, saying that the total cutting off of German dyes would throw 4,000,000 men in America out of employment. That may come again if we do not do something for this industry. Here is an instance of the way it affected the Government of the United States. It is contained in a letter from Byron R. Newton, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to the Speaker of the House and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. I will read it. He says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 9, 1916.

SIR: Owing to conditions arising out of the European war, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which prepares all Government notes and other securities, national-bank notes and Federal reserve notes, postage and revenue stamps, and currency of the Philippine government, has found it impossible to purchase colors for inks in sufficient quantities in the United States to carry on its work. It has been compelled for over a year to use cheap and unsatisfactory substitutes for some of the colors, and as time has gone on even these substitutes have become more and more difficult to purchase, and it seems to be only a question of a short time until the supply of them will be exhausted.

At present the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has only two weeks' supply of reds and blues, which are the most important colors used by it.

Some time ago an order for 145,000 pounds of blues and reds was placed in Germany, and through the assistance of the State Department permission was granted for the exportation of these colors. The first of several consignments has just reached this country. Under the tariff act some, if not all, of these colors are dutiable, and it seems to me it is proper at this time and under these conditions for Congress by joint resolution to authorize the importation of all of these colors free. It is impossible to buy these colors here. The prices that are now paid for them in Germany are higher than the prices before the war plus the duty. The duty will be approximately $12,000, and it will be necessary to go to Congress for a deficiency appropriation if this duty is paid. There can be no question of this importation injuring in any manner any American industry.

I therefore have the honor to request that a joint resolution authorizing the admission free of duty of approximately 145,000 pounds of dry colors, valued at $40,000 to $50,000 (the exact amount not being determinable at this time owing to the fluctuations of exchange), from Germany for the use of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the same having been ordered December 10, 1915, and shipment being made to and in the name of the Secretary of the Treasury, said colors to be exclusively for the use of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, may be passed by Congress. As part of these colors has already been shipped and some of them are now in this country, I request that immediate action on this resolution may be taken, if possible.

I inclose herewith a suggested form of resolution.

Respectfully,

BYRON R. NEWTON,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. What proportion of these dyes that are now so greatly needed have they been able to produce in American factories?

Mr. LONGWORTH. They are making them all now—all these dyes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Who will represent the consuming public upon this commission?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No one will represent the consuming public directly, because the consuming public has no direct interest whatever in this matter. I will be glad to explain to the gentleman what I mean.

Mr. WALSH. I wish the gentleman would do that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I had intended to take that up later in my remarks, but since the gentleman has asked that question I will be glad to answer it now.

Mr. YATES. Before the gentleman does that——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I wish the gentleman would let me answer this question first.

Mr. YATES. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has asked me a question which ought to be vital in any discussion involving the tariff or legislation favoring industry. That is the question of what effect may it have upon the cost of living.

I will begin, first, with the question of the price of silk goods, where dyes form a more important item than they do in any other article of clothing of any kind. Silk requires a more expensive dye than any other fabric. The testimony before the committee shows that the highest estimate given by anyone as to the cost of the dye in a yard of silk selling for $5 a yard is between 4 and 5 cents a yard, so that even in the case of silks the cost is relatively nothing and would never be passed on to the customer. Think of it! In silk selling for $5 a yard, the total cost of the dye is only between 4 and 5 cents a yard.

In the cheaper articles—cotton goods—in which the poorer people are interested, the cost is much less. I will ask the Clerk to read this letter, to give my voice a rest for a moment. This is written by the treasurer of the United States Fininshing Co., which is, I believe, the largest consumer of these cotton dyes. It is with regard to the cost of the dyes in the goods.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE UNITED STATES FINISHING CO.,
320 Broadway, New York, N. Y., June 25, 1919.

Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to supplement the statement which I made on June 18 at the dyestuff hearing before your committee in behalf of the National Association of Finishers of Cotton Fabrics. At that time I did not have with me the figures given below.

In order to emphasize the fact that the actual cost of dyestuffs, apart from the cost of other materials, such as chemicals, is a relatively small proportion of the total cost of finishing cotton goods, I submit the following information:

During the 12 months from July 1, 1913, to July 1, 1914, immediately preceding the outbreak of the European war, the average cost of dyes used by the United States Finishing Co. in its three plants at Pawtucket and Providence, R. I., and Norwich, Conn. (engaged in the dyeing and printing of colored cotton fabrics of a total yardage of 204,009,507), was one-eighth of 1 cent per yard of goods finished. Practically all of the dyes used at that time were imported from Germany.

During the 12 months of the year 1918, at the same mills, and upon a yardage of 180,525,317, the average cost of dyes used was one-half of 1 cent per yard of goods finished. A large majority of the dyes used in 1918 were made in the United States.

The costs of dyes at the present time, and especially during the year 1918, are admittedly high. They are higher than it is confidently expected that American dyes will be with the expected decline in the cost of raw materials and with the increase in the range of colors which progress in the dyestuff industry will certainly develop. In other words, I feel that our average cost of one-half of 1 cent per yard for colors is a maximum figure, which is likely to be less from now on.

The point I wish to make, therefore, is that, even with a protective duty added, the cost of dyes per yard of cotton goods finished is a relatively small portion of the total cost of finishing. Consumers of dyes, like ourselves, are very much more anxious to see a permanent and self-contained dyestuff industry established in this country than they are to obtain such relatively slight reductions in cost as would result from the unrestricted competition of foreign dyestuff manufacturers.

As consumers of dyes, upon whom the burden of taxation would necessarily fall, we are willing to bear such a burden as a measure of insurance against a recurrence of the demoralized situation in the dyestuff market we experienced in the early years of the war.

A protective tariff, coupled with a well-administered licensing system, such as has been proposed by the Chemical Foundation, would, in my judgment, meet the situation adequately and be satisfactory alike to the manufacturers and consumers of dyes.

Yours, faithfully,

ANDREW C. IMBRIE, Treasurer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I dislike very much to inflict myself on the committee, but I have not nearly finished what it is necessary to say.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have applications for more time than I have left, but I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, if that will do. We have either got to have an extension of time or else cut out some of our friends, because we have applications for more time than we have.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I doubt whether I can cover this subject at all in less than half an hour.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman 20 minutes, and let him see how near he can come to it.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHEN] will yield the gentleman some time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am taking no particular pleasure in making this speech under the circumstances, because of my physical discomfort, but I feel that I ought to explain this bill fully.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman care to venture the prediction that this dye-licensing commission will not be required after two years from the approval of this act?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman frankly that if I had my way, I would like to make it three years. I think three years would be the ideal time, but I think two years will settle the question that America can produce these things.

Mr. ANDERSON. On this commission proposition——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman let me postpone the discussion of the commission proposition for a little?

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will answer the question when I come to it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Very well.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am discussing now what happened at the time of the war. In the first place, as I have said, the question of the cost of these dyes is immaterial, so far as the consuming public is concerned, because it will not know whether you increase the duties on dyes or not, for the cost of the dye in the goods the public buy is absolutely insignificant, only one-eighth of 1 cent a yard. It is too small to talk about. Even the figures given by the silk manufacturers refer to the present high cost of American dyes. Dyes to-day are higher than before the war, but they are going down all the time. For instance, one of the most important dyes used in this country, methyl violet, has gone down from $12 a pound in 1916 to $2.65 a pound in April, 1919. It is safe to assume that if you give American industry a chance to have competition all these present prices will be very speedily reduced.

The situation I have endeavored to describe to you when Germany went into this war called for drastic action. Congress endeavored to meet the situation to some extent by passing a bill which put a fairly protective duty on dyestuffs. This was the first time, so far as my knowledge goes, that a Democratic Congress ever used the tariff for the encouragement of an American industry without any thought of revenue. The overwhelming necessity of the situation compelled them to ignore, to this extent at least, their time-honored political tenets, and they are to be congratulated for their patriotic action. Even though the rates of duty were plainly inadequate and by no means measured the difference in cost of production here and in Germany, at least they afforded some encouragement to men here to risk the investment of great quantities of capital to produce the dyes which were absolutely necessary for the needs of the Government and the consuming public, and gave ground for hope that whichever political party was in control of the Government when the war came to an end, it would be seen to that their investment was not a total loss. And so a great number of American business men made large investments in dye production, until on the day the armistice was signed the industry had grown in this country to such an extent that the major demand of the American market was amply provided for.

But it must be frankly admitted that it was not the rates of duty provided in the act of September 8, 1916, but the fact that the war itself acted as an unsurmountable barrier to the importation of German dyes that has so far saved this baby industry.

To my mind, those Americans who have risked the investment of probably somewhere near three hundred millions to turn out those substances of which not only the people but the Government itself were in dire need deserve the support of the Government. They took tremendous risks, and we should see to it that their property is not swept away. They had not only to construct, but to learn to construct. They built crudely, perhaps, at the beginning, but more effectively as time went on. It is not a hard matter to build a brick wall if you have the bricks handy, but if you have not only to make the bricks but to learn how to make them it is a different matter, and that was just the sort of problem that our dye producers had to meet.

Without an extension of the legal safeguards now in force it would be only a question of a few months, with foreign competition, and particularly German competition restored, when this wall would be completely undermined and would topple to the ground. It is the object of this bill to see to it that this industry is not undermined; that it is given an opportunity to flourish and to grow until the time shall come, and that within a very few years, when we can say to Germany and the rest of the world, "We don't need your dyes. All we need are being made in American factories and by American workingmen."

So much for the business side of this question. I submit that it is one of vast and far-reaching importance, and yet I subordinate it entirely to the other or national side of this question, which I will discuss for a moment, and that first with that portion of it which relates to the public health. Your committee had some very valuable information on this phase of the question from Dr. Charles Steiglitz, head of the department of chemistry of the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill., expert advisor of the Federal Trade Commission during the war, and former president of the American Chemical Society, and a world authority on modern organic chemistry. Without commenting on his testimony in detail, I commend it to your most thoughtful attention. Generally speaking, it shows that the development of most of the modern cures for some of the most dreaded diseases are made from materials obtained from a coal-tar base and directly involved in this bill.

As he says:

> We use some materials which in the hands of the skilled organic chemist can be converted either to the production of dyes, explosives, poison gases, or to medicinals.

And again:

> The dye industry is the sole industry from which we can get our materials and our chemists and which can support the type of work which we have in mind.

In other words, gentlemen, unless we are to have a complete and self-sustaining dye industry in this country we will have to depend upon the chemists of foreign lands to make and to invent the remedies to make American life more secure and happy.

And now I come to the side of this question which relates to preparedness for the national defense. This consists of the relation of the dyestuffs industry to modern high explosives and to chemical gases. I shall not dwell at length upon the explosive question, because it has been a known fact for a long time that dyes and explosives bear the same relation as the Siamese twins. They are inextricably bound together. You can not make one without having the materials at hand to make the other. The fact is that in the same plant, with the same equipment and the same men, you can make either dyes or high explosives as you choose.

The relation between dyes and chemical gases, however, is of very recent development, and upon that point we had most interesting enlightenment from Gen. William L. Sibert, Chief of the Chemical Warfare Service, and from Col. Amos A. Fries, chief of the Chemical Warfare Service of the American Expeditionary Forces. A few quotations from their testimony will, I think, illuminate the situation.

Gen. Sibert, after having alluded to the enormous sums of money spent toward building of chemical and nitrate and other plants, and the fact that they probably cost at least twice as much as they would have cost if built in time of peace, said:

> If nitrate and dyestuff plants were built in time of peace, such plants would be a most essential preparation for war.

And further along he said:

> The dyestuff industry is the one peace-time enterprise which will furnish us with the plants and equipment which can be hurriedly converted to essential uses in time of war. If such plants do not exist in time of peace, they will have to be hastily constructed and equipped in time of emergency, and we will have the same situation arising as confronted us at the outbreak of this war.

And again:

> There is another point which is worthy of especial emphasis. We are not only concerned with plants and equipment, but also with the trained personnel needed. This war has shown that it takes two or three times as long to prepare the material of war as it does to train the personnel for war.

This latter point that Gen. Seibert makes, as it seems to me, strikes at the very root of the whole question. We have in this country in unlimited quantities the raw materials necessary for the manufacture of all these coal-tar products, whether they be dyes, tanning materials, medicinal preparations, high explosives, or poison gases; but we have not, as has Germany, the trained chemical force necessary to produce them in quantity and cheaply. Such a force can only be developed in time of peace, and then only in an industry which with proper legislative assistance can be conducted profitably, namely, the dye industry. Can it be questioned that the further development of poison gases and their antidotes will be of vital importance to the future of this Nation, both for preparedness for or insurance against war?

Col. Amos Fries went into the matter in even more detail. While at the start, when the Germans began to use these poison gases, it seemed to be a most barbarous and inhuman method of warfare, it has turned out that properly used it may be the most humane. Certain it is that while at the beginning, when these gases came as a surprise and no method of combating them was known, the casualties were very large, toward the end of the war they were comparatively insignificant.

You can make these gases of almost any strength, from the tear gases up. As Col. Fries says:

> The tear gases can be used against savages if we want to, or against any unprepared peoples, to drive them out of places without loss of life. If we had had it in the Philippines in times past we would not have needed to have lost our boys in taking those places, because there is no escape from it except in a mask.

I recall when I was in the Philippines some years ago that an uprising had just taken place in one of the southern islands. A lot of insurgents had gathered together in the bottom of an old dead crater, and we lost hundreds, I believe, of our men in trying to dislodge them. The only way our men could do was to climb up the sides of the crater and try to shoot the insurgents below. If we had had gas bombs fired over into the crater we might have captured every one of these men and not lost one of ours. That only shows what the possible future of chemical-gas warfare is. So far as its development in this country is concerned, it is dependent solely on the creation of a permanent, self-sustaining dyestuff industry.

Germany did not win the war, thank God, but it was not because of failure upon the chemical side of it. From the beginning to the end she had an unlimited and apparently inexhaustible supply of the bedrock of modern warfare—explosives and chemical gases. For 40 years she had planned for the exact situation that confronted her in the summer of 1914. Cut off from all her outside sources of supply, she at once turned over her huge chemical plants to the production of explosives and poison gases, and if her morale and her man power had not fallen down she might have been fighting yet, and perhaps for years to come. In this particular, if in no other, let us take pattern by Germany to the end that come what may we shall never again find ourselves deficient in at least the adequate potential supply of those materials which stand first as necessities for our national defense. Above all, let us see to it that for this supply we shall never again be dependent upon Germany.

I have attempted to sketch very briefly and very inadequately the reasons why the dyestuff industry is of such vital importance to the United States. I shall not even ask the question, Is it worth saving? I believe that there is in this country to-day an extraordinary and unprecedented unanimity of opinion that this industry is absolutely essential and must be preserved at all hazards. I take it for granted that the membership of this House is united in the belief that we must preserve it somehow. I take it, too, that upon both sides of the House there exists the conviction that it must be done by some sort of tariff legislation. The President, in his message on the 20th of last May, said:

Nevertheless there are parts of our tariff system which need prompt attention. The experiences of the war have made it plain that in some cases too great reliance on foreign supply is dangerous and that in determining some parts of our tariff policy domestic considerations must be borne in mind which are political as well as economic. Among the industries to which special consideration should be given is that of the manufacture of dyestuffs and related chemicals. Our complete dependence upon German supplies before the war made the interruption of trade a case of exceptional economic disturbance. The close relation between the manufacturer of dyestuffs on the one hand and of explosives and poisonous gases on the other, moreover, has given the industry an exceptional significance and value. Although the United States will gladly and unhesitatingly join in its program of international disarmament it will nevertheless be a policy of obvious prudence to make certain of the successful maintenance of many strong and well-equipped chemical plants. The German chemical industry, with which we will be brought into competition, was and may well be again a thoroughly knit monopoly capable of exercising a competition of a peculiarly insidious and dangerous kind.

I think that you, my colleagues on the Democratic side, under the circumstances, will be willing to go very far to carry out these recommendations of your party leader. I think that you, my colleagues on this side, would be willing to go to the very limit of tariff protection, if by protection alone, as we generally understand it, we could solve this problem. For myself I wish it could be solved by a protective tariff. That is the natural, easy, old-fashioned Republican way, but I think that it would be only a very reactionary party which would decline to go further in a case so vitally important as this, not only to American industry, but to the national safety as well, merely because the remedy suggested is new. I confess that when this so-called license system was first proposed it rather hit me in the eye. I do not like licensing boards very much in time of war, still less in time of peace, but a thoroughly conscientious and pretty exhaustive study of this situation has absolutely convinced me that this situation can only be met by some such system as proposed in this bill, and that without it it would be practically ineffective. I would never think of advocating it as a permanent governmental policy. I would never propose it except as a purely temporary expedient to prevent what is bound to occur, namely, the dumping of a tremendous mass of dye materials into this country, regardless of price, regardless of cost, regardless of any tariff rates that Congress might fix.

As a matter of fact, the term "licensing system" is a misnomer. It does not mean "licensing" as we ordinarily comprehend it. It does not mean a license to do business. It means a regulation of importation. All that we propose is that no dyes shall be imported when the same dyes are now being produced here at a reasonable price. The proposed board in the vast majority of cases will act automatically and will have no power to interfere with legitimate American business.

We are proposing this system in addition to the increased tariff, because as soon as the peace treaty is ratified the new American dye industry will be at once exposed to the competition of an adversary so powerful, so fierce, and so desperate that no practicable rates of duty will offer a really effective defense.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves the question of the commission proposing a license, I should like to ask him where the committee found any legislative precedent or any constitutional warrant for the designation of a commission of this kind by purely unofficial, commercial organizations.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am not myself by any means convinced that that is the best way of dealing with the question—that is, to have the industrial bodies themselves name the commission—but I can not see myself any constitutional difficulty in the way. This is a prohibition of importation except under certain conditions.

Mr. ANDERSON. But this is the exercise of a governmental function, is it not?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; it is a governmental function to prohibit the importation of goods.

Mr. ANDERSON. And the Constitution provides that the officials of the Government shall be appointed by the President and in other specified ways. I do not see where the Ways and Means Committee could get around that proposition.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman distinguishing between the war power and the peace power now?

Mr. ANDERSON. I was assuming that this legislation would not be passed as a part of the exercise of the war power.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The reason I asked that is that there is a board now exercising precisely the functions proposed to be exercised by this commission, except that its powers are very much larger.

Mr. ANDERSON. That may be true. I am not questioning the power of a commission properly appointed to exercise these functions, but what I am questioning is the power of Congress to say that this commission shall be designated by 11 or 9 or 10 wholly unofficial bodies which have no connection with the Government whatever.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would not care to hazard my reputation as a constitutional lawyer that this method of appointment is constitutional, but in my opinion it is. I confess that I have not examined the precedents to any extent.

Mr. ANDERSON. Did not the committee make an investigation, or was there no testimony before the committee on this question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. There was no question raised as to the constitutionality of this method of dealing with the question. It was the method suggested by certain members of the committee who were opposed to the proposition that the President appoint this board or commission.

Mr. Chairman, how much more time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, let me see if I can picture to you the German dye industry to-day. As we all know, its six great component companies controlled and produced all the dyestuffs necessary for practically the entire world's market. It employed more than 50,000 men and had assets of more than half a billion dollars. To-day those six concerns have been absorbed into one gigantic, Government-aided trust, formed in 1916, for the avowed purpose of fighting its way back, so soon as the war should be over, to the former German world monopoly.

Its plants have been busy throughout the war making all Germany's poison gases, most of her munitions, and, at the same time, enough dyes to establish a reserve which could not only overwhelm our market, but the markets of any other country in the world. This is the reason why England, France, and Japan, the principal dye-consuming and producing countries, have protected their own Government-aided lye industries by license laws substantially similar to the one proposed by this bill.

Did these plants suffer during the war, either by deterioration or loss of their trained personnel? On the contrary. From the beginning they were cherished and protected in every way by the German high command, because they were the sole source of supply of Germany's bedrock military necessities.

Consider the problem that the German dye trust has to face. With resources so colossal, with plants so huge and organized for such vast production, it must remain most of its former world market unless a part of its equipment is to lie idle and another part run at low efficiency. Without enormous production, it would cease to be a profitable business. Unless a profound change has come over German civilization and business methods it is unreasonable to suppose that its competition will be less unscrupulous than it was in the past, when it practiced every form of corrupt and unfair competition known to commerce. What can be more certain than when, instead of being in safe control of the world market, this industry faces destruction, that it will attack all competitors with ruthless disregard of any considerations of business decency. Where will this attack center? Not upon England, because England bars all importations of German dyes except under a license. Not France or Japan, because they similarly protect themselves. It is our market, therefore, that is Germany's real opening, and it is upon it that Germany's attack will be concentrated. Do you question that to penetrate it and destroy our budding chemical industry the German trust would hesitate for a moment to spend millions of its surplus, would use any method, fair or unfair, to gain its ends?

From all this it seems perfectly apparent that without further legislative assistance our coal-tar chemical industry is doomed to destruction, and that right speedily. Let me impress upon you that time is of the essence of this matter. The moment the peace treaty is ratified the various war boards which have exercised certain powers with regard to licensing importations of dyestuffs cease to operate and our only barrier against world competition will be our present entirely inadequate tariff protection. To double the duties, as this bill does, substantially, will not avail. To triple them or quadruple them will fall short of meeting the conditions that will soon be upon us.

The German trust would laugh at a duty of 500 per cent, for its immediate object is not so much to sell its vast accumulated store of dyes at a profit but to overwhelm and destroy our baby industry so that in a few years it may sell its goods here at whatever profit it pleases. If we can preserve our industry from this kind of cutthroat competition for the next two years we believe that it will have then expanded to the extent that the duties provided in this bill will insure its continued growth and expansion.

But these duties by themselves will fail immeasurably to meet the situation that immediately confronts us. We must go further or confess defeat in advance. We must provide a remedy, heroic if you please, but one which will do the job. England, France, and Japan have realized the situation and have met it in the only way it is possible effectively to meet it by prohibiting all importations of dyestuffs except under a Government license. Leaving Germany out of the question, are we justified in throwing open our markets to nations who close theirs to us? Such a policy, I think, would sound altruistic to even the most advanced internationalist. The policy we advocate can hurt no one except the German trust and its agents here. On the other hand the great mass of the American people are bound to receive substantial benefit and the country will be made secure for all time in the bedrock necessities for adequate national preparedness. Pass this bill, my colleagues, substantially as it is and we shall have removed forever the odious condition by virtue of which we have been dependent upon others for the supply of things vital not only to the welfare of our people but to the integrity of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman any time left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. DEWALT. The framer of this bill or the committee framing the bill, when they did so, did they consider it as a revenue measure or did they consider it as a measure regulating foreign commerce, or both?

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I have explained, incidentally it will produce considerable revenue, but, of course, our purpose is to keep out German importations, except those that are temporarily necessary for the convenience of the American textile manufacturers.

Mr. DEWALT. Granting that it is a measure to regulate foreign commerce, and granting also that the power to regulate foreign commerce is in the Congress of the United States, did the framer of the bill or the committee itself take into consideration that there was a delegation of the power of Congress to this commission?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended one-half minute to answer the question.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield one-half minute to the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I attempted to answer the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON]. I think there is no question in the world that the Congress has the right to prohibit the importation into this country of any article or provide an agency by which the question should be determined.

Mr. DEWALT. That is, to delegate the power to a commission of this kind?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is, in so far as the importation of a certain article is concerned.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, after the very full and illuminating description of the bill before us presented by our colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], possibly extensions and explanations are almost unnecessary, because he certainly has given us a very able and full description of the bill. I can not expect to add to your information through anything that I may say, but it is a very big subject, and possibly I may bring to you a little different viewpoint on certain of its features than has the gentleman from Ohio.

The bill under consideration, H. R. 8078, entitled "A bill to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled 'An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes,'" offers one of the most interesting problems for consideration of this House that has come to my attention during my membership in this body. It may not be as far-reaching as some general bills from the Ways and Means Committee, such, for instance, as the revenue acts, but the subject with which it deals has the broadest ramifications. It is not my purpose to go into the tariff features of the bill in detail, other members of the committee with more experience and more intimate knowledge of the subject being much better qualified to explain to the House these sections. I am in hearty accord, however, with the tariff provisions and believe that it is in accordance with sound doctrine and Republican principles to provide the necessary protection to such an industry. Particularly is this true, as it is a well-known fact that dye manufacturing comes absolutely within the province of an infant industry, needing the support and assistance that a protective tariff provides. But the subject is much greater and broader than simply one of a protective duty.

IMPORTANCE OF DYE INDUSTRY.

The Committee on Ways and Means gave extended hearings on the original bill introduced by Mr. LONGWORTH, and supplemented by two further bills. The first, H. R. 2706, did not contain the section providing for the appointment of a licensing commission. The second, H. R. 6495, did contain this provision, and the bill now before the House, H. R. 8078, is the committee revision of the second Longworth bill. The hearings very clearly developed the principal interests of the proponents of the measure. It was early shown that the great textile interests of the country, which abound in New England, and particularly in Massachusetts, were not primarily the subject of solicitude, but rather the development of the manufacture of coal-tar products from the viewpoint of the scientist, the chemist, and the philanthropist. While having every sympathy with the altruistic purposes of the gentlemen interested, as the Massachusetts representative on the Ways and Means Committee, I for one could not overlook the claims of the textile people and the thousands of wage earners in their employ. The industries of Massachusetts and New England are very vitally interested in the use of dyes, and from my viewpoint these interests take precedence over the other questions involved in the pending legislation.

Illustrating the importance of this industry, I beg to insert the tables which are printed in the hearings before the committee. Table A is a list of the industries directly dependent on dyestuffs, showing the number of establishments to be 11,037; the number of persons employed, 1,070,460; the capital invested, $2,530,207,000; value of products, $2,631,390,000. I might add that nearly every one of these industries is represented in Massachusetts or New England and the same statement would apply to Table B. The tables are here given:

AUTHORSHIP OF BILL.

With due deference to my distinguished colleague, whose name is associated with this bill, it probably is fair to say that at least he had colaborers in its preparation. The eminent counsel who appeared before us did not desire to assume the entire credit for the preparation of the bill, nor did the representative of the Federal Trade Commission acknowledge authorship. Likewise, the Alien Property Custodian showed a disposition to sidestep. But it was very apparent that its introduction did not come as a surprise to any one of these persons.

THE CHEMICAL FOUNDATION (INC.).

The hearings were conducted by Hon. J. Harry Covington and Joseph H. Choate, jr., as counsel for the Chemical Foundation and the American Dyes Institute. The Chemical Foundation is a recently formed organization of gentlemen in no way connected with previous manufacture of dyes for commercial purposes, but are gentlemen of high standing who evidently have become interested in the philanthropic side of the manufacture of coal-tar products. The president is Hon. Francis P. Garvan, until recently Alien Property Custodian, but, I believe, at the present time Assistant Attorney General. Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, former Alien Property Custodian, disposed of practically all important German chemical patents which had been seized through him to the Chemical Foundation, reserving, however, to the Government itself the most important one, namely, the patent for the manufacture of salvarsan. Whether or not it is good ethics for the Alien Property Custodian to sell at a comparatively nominal price such enormously important and valuable rights as are contained in these patents to a company of which he himself is president I will not discuss. The only redeeming feature about the transaction is that neither he nor his associates in the Chemical Foundation need the financial benefit which certainly might accrue through this opportunity.

It will, therefore, be plainly seen that so far as the use of German patents is concerned the Alien Property Custodian has placed in the hands of a group of gentlemen a monopolistic control, which we are told by them will be used to the advantage of the general public. It is to be sincerely hoped that this promise is made in absolute good faith. Personally I have no reason to doubt but that it is. These patents will undoubtedly be made the basis of the future manufacture of dyestuffs in this country, as they have been very generally used during the period of the war, and the experimental work that is now being carried on by certain large manufacturers in this country is, I infer, largely based on their rights to use these seized German patents.

The personnel of the trustees of the Chemical Foundation amply demonstrates that the mercantile use of dyestuffs is absolutely subservient and secondary to the other interests involved. The people promoting the Chemical Foundation found it convenient to make use of names of prominent citizens rather than men interested in the commercial side of the question. That the names have been used in the above manner is evidenced by the fact that one of the trustees, at least, acknowledged in a letter to the clerk of the committee that he did not have sufficient knowledge to add anything to the information submitted to the committee. We can fairly criticize the form of the contract submitted by the Chemical Foundation to manufacturers desiring to use the German patents. This license agreement ties the hands of the manufacturers and in every way keeps the control within the reach of the Chemical Foundation. There is no possible loophole, and the manufacturer is entirely within the power of an organization in no way interested in the commercial feature of the use of the patents.

DEVELOPMENT OF DYESTUFF INDUSTRY.

The future of the dyestuff industry in this country is one of the most important developments following the war. It is important because of its threefold connection. Coal tar is the key and basis of dyestuffs, important chemical compounds, and high explosives, and the interrelation between the three is the interesting and very material feature of the bill before us. The production of dyes for world use previous to the war is another illustration of the keen perception of the German Government in cooperation with their business men. We, as Americans, would not admit that American genius and industry could not have perfected the use of coal-tar products in this country to the same extent as any other set of citizens. But the fact remains that we were lulled to sleep by the easy method of securing same through importation from Germany. Germany was glad to continue to supply the soporific influence, as her authorities realized the importance of the control of coal-tar products as a source of national defense, and the helplessness of the nation entering into war without the opportunity of quickly transferring the commercial factory for dyestuffs into a powerful war energy in the manufacture of high explosives. As an illustration of our dependence on Germany for dyestuffs previous to the war period, we only need to cite the instance that the cargo of the submarine Deutschland was practically entirely made up of dyestuffs or intermediates. It is safe to say that aside from a few students of chemistry at that time very few of our citizens realized the interrelation and the narrow separation between coal-tar products for commercial purposes and their use for high explosives. With the alertness displayed by our students of war problems and our manufacturers, it was but a short time after the declaration of war before this country was manufacturing dyestuffs and at the same time the necessary explosives to help win the war. The question confronting us to-day is, Shall such legislation be passed as will protect that infant industry and continue to have available for the future factories where a quick transfer can be made if occasion should require?

FUTURE DYE SUPPLY OF THIS COUNTRY.

We therefore face two problems, absolutely distinct and separate of themselves, but closely interwoven with each other, namely, the manner in which our manufacturers needing dyes will procure them in the future, and the chemical and explosive products from coal tar. I shall address myself principally to the first subject.

Owing to the intricate method of the manufacture of dyes and their easy change from one quality or color to another by chemical processes, it is claimed, and perhaps with some degree of truth, that it is almost impossible to exclude German dyes at this time, either through a high tariff or a stringent antidumping clause. The proponents of the licensing system hold out as a source of great fear to American interests the quantity of the German dyes probably now on hand and ready for shipment to this country at prices below market value. This scare is well answered in a recent address by one of the recognized authorities on tariff matters, Col. John P. Wood, of Philadelphia, from which I quote the following:

> By the time all the other countries that to-day want dyes have received their share of that present value $20,000,000 stock, and when from what is left is eliminated, those dyes that can not be sent here in competition with domestic products which can now be successfully sold in the world's markets, the remainder must be vastly less than normal.

It will therefore be seen that the quantity probably now on hand in Germany need not be a serious menace and that important manufacturers are not anticipating an undue supply. If it is so absolutely wrong at this time to use dyes of Germany, what explanation is offered of the announcement that the President has sent abroad an agent authorized to secure a six months' supply for use in this country? Reliable information has recently been received that the association of shirt makers of the country secured the appointment of this agent through the influence of the Alien Property Custodian, who is president of the Chemical Foundation.

Further, our manufacturers, being obliged to compete with goods of foreign production, must be in a position to secure those dyes best adapted to their immediate needs without regard to their cost and with as little delay as possible. In this connection it may be stated that, although the aggregate volume of dyes used in this country is enormous, the actual increase of the price of a yard of goods on account of the cost of the dye itself is very small. There are two large producers in this country who have entered the business as a result of the war and who, it is claimed, will be the principal beneficiaries under this act, namely, the National Aniline & Chemical Co. and the Du Pont interests.

PRESENT LARGEST PRODUCERS IN AMERICA.

The National Aniline & Chemical Co. is a combination of those formerly interested in the German importations, but are now manufacturing upon a comparatively large scale in this country. The Du Ponts are also manufacturing a large quantity of dyes and we are informed are conducting very extensive experiments in their factories and laboratories. Neither of these companies submitted testimony before the committee, but their representatives were constantly in attendance and showed keen interest in the proceedings. It is fair to assume that in the three names to be submitted by the American Dyes Institute in the formation of the licensing board these two large concerns will not be unrepresented. What reason is assigned for the intense interest of the above organizations but failure to openly state their attitude before the committee and submit themselves to questions by the committee? If the American Dyes Institute is not actively controlled by these two concerns, their influence within it is sufficiently powerful to practically direct its action. If they are only looking to the greatest good for the greatest number and have no selfish motives to further, there would appear to be no reason for their remaining in the background during the time the hearings were held on the bill.

THE LICENSING SYSTEM.

The real crux of the bill is the proposal of a licensing system, as it is the only new suggestion under consideration. The tariff rates are largely augmented, as it is right they should be, but adoption of this system, other than as a positive war emergency, is a new departure and accompanied with dangerous possibilities. In addition to the direct interest of those forming the Chemical Foundation, the proponents placed their arguments before various prominent men in the textile industry and secured considerable support. Some of this support was afterwards qualified, but at the time of the hearings it is fair to state that the majority of the textile interests from whom the committee heard was evidently favorable to the licensing system.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I am satisfied that the gentleman from Massachusetts offered amendments to this bill in the committee which improved it very greatly, and I know that he was very fearful that the licensing feature of this bill would be dangerous to the manufacturing interests of the country. Is not that correct?

Mr. TREADWAY. I think that is correct.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Now, coming as I do from the Northwest, where we have no manufacturing to speak of, but are customers buying the cloth, and so forth, manufactured in the East, my thought is our interest in this legislation is just as great as that of the manufacturers. We are both interested in and must look to the quality, and I am satisfied, and I think the Members of Congress who are here to-day are satisfied, that the quality of the dyes that have been used during the past couple of years is very inferior and very much below the standard.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the gentleman is correct in that statement, and it is a very interesting subject. The testimony the committee received can perhaps be explained something in this manner: The quality of the dyes as made in Germany appears as the result of many years of actual work in their preparation as regards their chemical analysis and the articles going to make them up. They have been able through this long period of years to perfect their methods so that the same quantity of the crudes will actually produce under their system a larger quantity of the intermediates or the finished dyes.

The testimony before the committee seemed to indicate that, dye for dye, so far as our efforts have gone during the brief period we have been making them, our chemists and manufacturers are perfecting the products so that they can compete successfully in quality now with the imported dyes. One reason probably for the poor quality to which the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] refers, during the past two years, is the result of the great haste that has been necessary to get any dyes in this country to take the place of those we could not import. Further than that, the first concern of the manufacturers during this past two-year period, the time we were actually engaged in the war, was the necessary production of high explosives. The dye industry was secondary, of course, to the manufacture of high explosives. But looking to the future, giving chemists of this country the opportunity for study and labor in the preparation of dyes, there is absolutely no reason why, dye for dye, we eventually are not going to be able to compete with any product of any foreign country.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Right along that line, did not the testimony before the committee show that American dyes are already in a position to compete successfully and are competing successfully?

Mr. TREADWAY. A great many of them, but not all. We are not making in this country the so-called vat dyes.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Are we not exporting successfully any dyes we are not using to foreign countries and selling them?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am not able to give the gentleman much information on the export feature. But it is certainly true that with the intricacy of dye manufactures and thousands of different grades made by the chemical mixtures, we are making to-day comparatively few of the aggregate of those actually used in the manufacture of goods.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Was there any testimony taken before your committee showing the conditions under which any independent company could get from this Chemical Foundation the use of the formulas for making these dyes?

Mr. TREADWAY. The conditions will be referred to a little further on in my remarks, but if I do not answer the gentleman's question I shall be glad to be interrupted on that point.

Resuming in reference to the licensing system, it now appears evident that some of this support was the result of adroit arguments being laid before the business concerns and the support obtained without the parties thoroughly familiarizing themselves with the details of the bill or the effect upon their business the licensing system might have. Members of the committee, and I assume the Members of the House, have been hearing from representatives of the industries affected, and there evidently has been considerable change in public sentiment on the measure in the past few weeks. In my own district, where there are very large consumers of dyes, there was a great difference of opinion. The licensing sections as originally submitted were far from satisfactory, and I should have been opposed to the bill had not these sections been rewritten by the committee. Let me briefly note the changes. Originally the period of the life of the dye-licensing commission was to have been for five years. This has been reduced to two. In the first draft the commission was to have been appointed by the President. This was revised so that the commission was to be appointed by various organizations interested in the industry, but would have been controlled by the manufacturers of dyes rather than the industries using the dyes. In other words, the power to grant licenses would have been practically in the hands of the American Dyes Institute. The present draft, section 503 (b), forms the commission of six users of dyes and four manufacturers chosen from various organizations directly affected, so that the users will control the organization. Even with these changes in the personnel it has been found that the board does not meet the approval of the manufacturers, as evidenced by numerous protests reaching the members of the committee since the new draft was made public.

Another extremely important change is the removal of the decision to issue the license upon the judgment of the commission whether or not the dye can be procured in this country. It is now obligatory on the commission to issue the license for importation, provided it be shown that the person applying for the license can not procure the same dye through domestic markets.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I would like to ask my colleague this question: He has made the statement either that the users of dyes would control, or it is claimed that the users will control, the board. Granting a majority of the board is made up of manufacturers who use the dyes——

Mr. TREADWAY. There are to be six members, my colleague understands.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Let us assume, then, that six manufacturers are selected who will have that responsibility, and we will say that you are a manufacturer but that you do not happen to have a membership on that board; that you were not appointed, and you come to that board believing that you can not get a dye in the United States that will enable you to make a cloth that you can sell in South America in competition with goods dyed, say, in Great Britain—now, I think we found during this war that men who served on these boards are human and they are not always alert to do their duty, and possibly from lack of interest or failure to attend a meeting, or possibly even because they envy the big business you have, or out of some old antagonism to you, one of the members of the board may suggest that they refuse to give the license to you, and thereby can compel you to buy that dye in this country against your judgment, when your judgment tells you you must get that dye in Germany or the quality of your product will suffer so much that you will lose business in South America. Now, then, in that case the board either might flatly refuse to give you that license or it might be suggested they let it go over until the next meeting, and by the next meeting you have lost your business or it has been seriously injured. Do you not think it is fair to assume that this licensing proposition involves discretion on the part of the board and it may be used against your interest?

Mr. TREADWAY. The latter part of the gentleman's inquiry brings up the question of delay in granting licenses, which was a very serious argument against the system. I think rather than saying that the granting of a particular license, to which he refers, should go over until the next meeting of the board, perhaps it would be fair to say that feature might be overcome by the general rules that undoubtedly will be laid down by the commission in granting licenses, and that as a matter of actually obtaining a license the manufacturer will not necessarily have to make his application to the full membership of the board. In other words, the chairman, who is the executive officer, and the only man under salary, will, of course, have a wide latitude of power in the use of authority granted to the commission. I think that is fairly safeguarded in the bill. The board will be allowed to make its own rules and regulations, and it is natural to assume that these people will be interested in the development of the industry, and in the industry itself, and in the use of the dyes, and the manufacture of the finished goods, because they themselves are manufacturers. It is hard to conceive that men big enough to represent these large organizations on such a board as this would be petty and small to a business competitor and bring forward the matter of a delay in order not to grant a license to a competitor. I do not think that would be an American proposition.

The rest of the gentleman's inquiry being directed to the question as to whether a manufacturer himself wants a foreign dye or not, that was thrashed out so fully that I think the committee were fairly agreed that the man applying for the license is the one whose judgment will actually be the decisive factor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I have 10 minutes more, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts believe that the committee will issue a license to each merchant that comes along and asks for a license?

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, I think from the method of the formation of the board if a man says that a dye is not suitable for the kind of goods he wants to use it in, his word is the deciding factor rather than the judgment of the commission.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then why have the licenses made at all?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am not a keen supporter, as the gentleman knows, of the original proposition to establish this system.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. HULINGS. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], in answer to the question I asked of him, to say that we were now making these dyes in America. Did I understand him aright?

Mr. TREADWAY. We are making a great many of them, but as I explained in answer to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], we are not making all of them. I can not begin to say how many there are. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] how many kinds and styles of dyes are there actually in use, and how many are made in this country? I would like the gentleman from Ohio to answer in detail that question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The reports show that there are about 900 different colors that are in use.

Mr. HULINGS. Some of them we can not yet make?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Some of them we can not yet make, but a very few.

Mr. HULINGS. Why should we not protect the American dye makers by a tariff on these that we do not now make, so that any manufacturer can take up these imports that are brought here under that tariff, and at the same time be protecting the development by American manufacturers of these dyes that we do not yet make?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is exactly the claim of the proponents of the licensing system, that by establishing the license system we are protecting those dyes that are made in this country and giving them a chance to develop.

Mr. HULINGS. This Chemical Foundation owns these German patents. Nobody can use them except at their will?

Mr. TREADWAY. At the license of the Chemical Foundation, which, it seems to me, is a pretty powerful weapon that we are placing in the hands of a board in no way connected with dye manufacturing.

Mr. HULINGS. Why would it not be just as well if the Government should take up those patents and make them free to the use of any manufacturer, and then establish a tariff to protect them without any license?

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] answered very fully in his statement regarding what he considered to be the absolute need of the licensing system. As one of the members of the committee I am free to say that I have not followed quite so far as the gentleman from Ohio along the line of the imperative need of the licensing board. Probably the gentleman will see, from the nature of the remarks I have made, that I am not a very keen advocate even of the present licensing feature of the bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The German patents cover only a very small number of dyes now being made in America. A number of them have expired, and a number of them are about to expire, so that it does not involve the bedrock of the American production.

Mr. HULINGS. What is the relation of the Chemical Foundation that has these patents and the licensing commission?

Mr. LONGWORTH. There is none whatever. The Chemical Foundation has these patents, and this license commission deals only with importers of dyes, and has nothing to do with the manufacture of dyes in this country.

Mr. HULINGS. In that case I really can not see why there is any use in introducing this licensing system.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am afraid the gentleman from Pennsylvania has not been convinced by the argument that the gentleman from Ohio has made for two hours here.

I believe the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] asked with reference to the form of the license to be issued by the Chemical Foundation?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. And the conditions under which they are issued.

Mr. TREADWAY. The Chemical Foundation absolutely keeps control of the license it grants to any licensee. For further confirmation of that I would refer the gentleman to page 513 of the hearings, where the form of the license appears and the statement issued by the Federal Trade Commission. It is a very powerful and strongly drawn license. The gentleman may be interested in section 13 particularly: "This license may be canceled and terminated in the following manner." It proceeds to tell how the Chemical Foundation can cancel the license and give no reason whatever why it should do so. I fear that the form of the license will give unbounded authority.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. The thought I had in mind was this: That with your license system in this bill and the necessity of procuring a license from the Chemical Foundation Co. you would practically say to an independent man that wanted to get into the dye business, "You can not get in unless you can get inside the combination of one organization or the other."

Mr. TREADWAY. Absolutely, if you doubt the altruistic intentions of the people who are bringing this legislation before us. They represent they are bringing this legislation before us, as I stated in the beginning of my remarks, for the broadest development of the industry, without any financial interest. But they are getting power and authority under this bill which, if lodged in the wrong hands, would be the most powerful agency for monopoly ever established in this country. The bill presents a method of controlling importations through the license system, while the Chemical Foundation controls the local manufacture through ownership of German patents. You must believe in the men back of it in order to believe in the bill itself.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Will not the gentleman admit that danger?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not hesitate to admit it. I have admitted it all along.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, this bill in no way affects the Chemical Foundation. It has nothing to do with the Chemical Foundation. It gives them neither rights nor privileges.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska rose.

Mr. TREADWAY. Does the gentleman from Nebraska desire to ask me a question?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Yes. Then you separate the two? Are they not connected absolutely together in the ultimate result?

Mr. LONGWORTH. They are not connected together in any possible way, as the gentleman from Massachusetts explained. The Chemical Foundation owns some of these chemical patents, which it licenses to American manufacturers, who themselves are manufacturing dyes here in America. The licensing commission simply grants licenses to persons to import dyes to be used in America, not to manufacture dyes. The two things are as far apart as the poles. This bill affects the licensing commission and has nothing whatever to do with the Chemical Foundation.

Mr. TREADWAY. In conjunction with what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has just suggested, may I say that this fact appears that the Chemical Foundation controls, as we both have endeavored to explain, the use of the seized German patents, 4,500 of them here in the United States, which are in the hands of the Chemical Foundation. That is for dyes made in this country. Now, the Licensing Board is to permit the manufacturer desiring to import dyes to secure them by importation. The Chemical Foundation is domestic, the Licensing Board is for foreign products. But this fact is very distinct and plain, that the Chemical Foundation and the American Dye Institute are sufficiently closely allied so that the same counsel appeared before our committee for both organizations, and three members of the Licensing Board are to be members of the American Dye Institute, as provided in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. I shall have to ask for 10 minutes more.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. KITCHIN. Would the gentleman like five minutes from this side?

Mr. TREADWAY. I would.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think gentlemen on that side are so much in need of enlightenment and information on this question that I am glad to yield five minutes more to the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. TREADWAY. As I started to explain, there are to be three members of the American Dye Institute on the Licensing Board. The Dye Institute and the Chemical Foundation are practically one. They are interrelated in such a way that as I say the same attorney appeared for both organizations. Consequently I can not agree to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that there is no relation between the two bodies, because there is. While the Chemical Foundation deals with one subject, there will be in the Licensing Board three members of the American Dye Institute, so that there is a very close relation between the two bodies, although they are for different purposes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, so that we may get this thing exactly straight——

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My statement was that there was no relation between their duties, and that this bill has no effect whatever one way or the other upon the Chemical Foundation.

Mr. TREADWAY. Not at all. I corroborate the gentleman's statement in that respect, that the Chemical Foundation has to do with domestic licenses and the Licensing Board has to do with foreign licenses, so that so far as their duties are concerned there is no connection.

LICENSES ONLY FOR WAR EMERGENCIES.

In general I am not a believer in the licensing system. As a war emergency it may have been necessary, but even during the strenuous period of the past two years its power has been seriously abused. Our manufacturers were willing during the stress of wars to submit to delays incident to control by licensing boards and the necessary governmental red tape. That condition is entirely removed at the present time. Both domestic and foreign competition will enter into and become a part of the successful carrying on of business. Customers of big manufacturing plants will not accept the reasons given for nondelivery during the war. While the proponents of the bill, men lacking in experience in the dye business, claim this licensing system would not delay the manufacture of goods, I prefer to weigh against this evidence that now being submitted by men to whom are intrusted the carrying on of the business itself. Again, I have in mind Col. Wood's address. We are told this is practically the only industry that will need the support of a license system. I fear the moment this is adopted other excuses, perhaps as valid as this one, will be presented for our consideration and the horrible example of adoption of this one will come back to trouble us.

I am absolutely opposed to any autocratic, departmental authority being granted over business, and I have with great reluctance consented to support the license system as finally drafted in this bill. I do this only in view of the fact that departmental authority has been completely eliminated. In its present form the licensing board does not recognize any governmental connection, and if we are to have licenses issued for any purpose in connection with business the method under which this one is constituted has as few objectionable features as any that have been suggested.

PERMANENCY OF DYE INDUSTRIES.

There is no industry so important in all its ramifications as the one we are considering. It must be fostered and made permanent in this country. The threefold purposes of coal-tar products are separately or collectively of sufficient importance to warrant almost any exception being made to what would be regarded as the general policy of legislation. The dyestuffs industry in this country must be put on a footing absolutely independent of Germany and able to compete in every way with German products in the near future. Never again must such a sword hang over this Nation as our prewar dependence on Germany for coal-tar products. We are therefore justified in adopting extraordinary and exceptional methods of both excluding German products and fostering our own industry in this country. [Applause.]

Unless some gentleman desires to ask me a question, I yield back the remainder of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2972) to extend the cancellation-stamp privilege for the Roosevelt Memorial Association.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GRONNA, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH].

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon this bill by inserting in the RECORD an address upon this subject recently made by Mr. Culberson, a member of the Tariff Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, to-day, under a special rule brought before the House, the rent antiprofiteering bill was sent to conference with only five minutes' debate. I had hoped to be able to say something at that time in criticism of what is known as the Ball rent bill, a bill introduced by Senator BALL, of Delaware, and which was put as a rider upon one of the agricultural bills.

Not having had an opportunity this morning to address myself to that bill, I am compelled to take advantage of this opportunity, when another bill is under discussion, for the purpose of discussing that bill.

It is my desire to take what is known as the Ball rent bill section by section and invite attention to what I think are unwise provisions in it. If I should say anything which might bear the construction in the least as reflecting upon its author I want to say at the outset that, if done, it will be thoughtlessly and unintentionally done, because I believe he has been actuated only by the very best motives.

I saw in the Washington Star of yesterday a short history of the life of the Senator whose name this bill bears. In that he describes himself as "a country doctor." I believe that since that is true, and since he has devoted his life to writing prescriptions instead of bills which must stand the constitutional test, accounts for some of the provisions in the bill which I deem to be quite unwise. In addition to that, I think I see all through this bill the voice of Jacob and the hand of Esau. This Congress is quite familiar with what I think of the successful attempts which defeated rent legislation in the last Congress.

This bill really was not considered in the Senate. As evidencing that I will read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when the bill was under discussion. I read from the RECORD of September 12, 1919:

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a condition of that kind existing, and I think a section ought to be added to cover it, if it is not already covered. I had understood that there was a provision of that kind in the bill. I have not seen the print. I am just running through it now. The Senator has prepared a section of that kind.

Immediately after that Senator JONES from the State of Washington said:

Mr. JONES of Washington. I submitted a rough draft of a proposition of that kind to the chairman of the committee on yesterday. I have been busy myself, and I understood that it had been turned over to the drafting expert to be put in proper shape, and understood that it was going to go in the bill, but the only provision I see is the provision limiting it to September 15. I have not here the draft that I prepared. I will ask the Senator this question: Does the Senator think the commission that is provided for here could, to use a common expression, overhaul a lease of that kind?

A little further along in the debate this colloquy occurred:

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have been unable to follow very accurately the amendments which have recently been adopted to this provision, and I want to ask some one who has charge of the measure whether, under the amendment last agreed to, the owner of a property or the purchaser of it can recover possession of his house if he desires to occupy it himself, but in order to recover possession of it he must occupy it, and will not be permitted to lease it or rent it to another? Is that the policy of the legislation that is proposed here?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio can answer that question.

Mr. POMERENE. My mind was occupied with another question, and I was not following the query of the Senator from Arkansas.

Then a little later on Senator POMERENE undertook to answer the question. The Senator who is the author of the bill was absent. We have the Senator, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, offering it as an amendment to the agricultural bill when he had not read it.

Then we have the Senator from the State of Washington, Senator JONES, saying that he prepared an amendment and submitted it, and that it was to go into the bill, but that he could not find it in the bill. Then when the various Senators—and as far as I can ascertain there were only seven present—were discussing the proposition, Senator ROBINSON asked somebody to tell him something about it, and the presiding officer immediately referred to the Senator from Ohio, Senator POMERENE.

The bill first provides a commission to stop profiteering in rents, and before it concludes it takes away that means.

In the beginning of the bill we find this term:

The term "rental property," as defined in the bill, means "any building or any part thereof in the District of Columbia rented or hired for dwelling purposes and the furniture or furnishings therein, but does not include hotels or apartments."

Let me invite the attention of the House to the word "building" in that sentence. The term "rental property" means buildings.

Anybody who knows anything about rent profiteering in the District of Columbia knows that the United States Government is suffering terribly at the hands of the rent profiteers. It is suffering through the renting of vacant land. The United States in the District of Columbia to-day is paying an annual rent equal to one-half of what the vacant real estate is worth. Is it an accident that the bill was drawn so as to cover "buildings" alone and not real estate that the United States Government is renting? I will leave the answer to you.

Another definition in the bill is this:

The term "true value" is defined in the bill as meaning the "actual market value" of the property at the time in question.

In the body of the bill it provides that the rent shall be based on the "true value" of the property. Then under the definition clause it defines the "true value" to mean the "actual market value." For years it has been accepted by the courts that the real value is that fixed in a voluntary sale to a purchaser who is not compelled to buy. The "market value" in the District of Columbia to-day is the price realized by one who voluntarily sells to one who is compelled to buy or go out into the streets. Nobody can make me believe that that definition slipped into this bill by accident only. In my opinion it was put there by somebody, I know not by whom, for the purpose of getting rents not upon the real value but upon this compulsory market value.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman not want to state who injected that into the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know who. If I knew I would unhesitatingly state.

The bill provides that a commission to be known as the rent commission of the District of Columbia be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Upon former occasions I have said, and I repeat it now, that it is next to impossible to find a man in the District of Columbia who amounts to anything who will take a position of that kind and do his duty. If he be a lawyer, as I have said on former occasions, he must get out of the practice of the law after he has done his duty to tenants. If he be a doctor, he must do the same thing, and if he be a merchant he must do the same thing. I said that before anybody was appointed in the District of Columbia to take care of the rights of tenants. The War Department took a lawyer here in town for that task. By and by he was made a captain, and he was sent to the courts every day to prevent the ejection of war workers. He himself told me only a few days ago that just as he was retiring from that position one of the most prominent real estate dealers in the town came to him and tauntingly said, "What are you going to do when you get out of this Army position?" Clearly, he tells me, implying thereby that he had to go out of the practice of law. Following that his law firm put him out. We have now presented the same proposition, that you are to have a commission of three men, pay them $6,000 a year each, and that each must live in the District of Columbia and must be confirmed by the Senate. If, after they are selected, the United States Senate does not confirm them any quicker than it has granted relief to the oppressed war-worker tenants of the District of Columbia, God knows that their confirmation will be long deferred.

I wish to now direct attention to another feature of the bill, and that is that no complaint can be made to the rent commission until the relation of landlord and tenant exists, and no complaint can be made after the relation of landlord and tenant ceases to exist. If no complaint can be made to the rent commission before the relation of landlord and tenant commences, then when is it to be made? Not until after the tenant is in the house, the apartment, or the room of the landlord, getting heat, light, elevator service, or the linen changed on his bed. Do you tell me that that tenant, even though he be one of our most oppressed war workers, is going to this commission and make complaint against the landlord, who under the terms of the bill can not put him out but who can make things so disagreeable around the house that the tenant can not remain? I predict that if this bill becomes a law there will never be a complaint, and in the meantime this commission of three men will be getting $6,000 a year each, another getting $2,000, with a secretary getting $3,000, a commission with carte blanche to employ whomsoever it pleases, including an attorney, at salaries to be fixed by the commission. The money will be absolutely thrown away, because, as I say, there will never be a complaint. The man who is able to pay the extortionate rent is going to pay it in silence, and the one who is unable to pay it is never going to complain, because the only remedy is a long-drawn-out lawsuit.

During the last Congress, when a rent antiprofiteering bill had passed this House and gone over to the other body, a hearing was held. In that hearing a man named Bates Warren appeared as a spokesman for the real estate people, and this colloquy appeared in the hearings:

Senator HOLLIS. Are you familiar with any place where they do have a rent administrator?

Mr. WARREN. Not in rents.

Senator HOLLIS. Is that an invention of your own, Mr. Warren?

Mr. WARREN. I will not claim it as my own. We all discussed it, and it comes out. I drafted the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it is hardly worth while for me to proceed, because I can not discuss the matter in so short a time, but I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, before I conclude I wish to present, so that it may be published in the RECORD, some figures obtained by me from the departments here in Washington which kept them from March 11, 1918, down to and including the 4th of November, 1918. This paper which I shall insert in the RECORD gives the number of clerks called to Washington by the Government in our recent emergency. It is not picked out for a particular time. It is all the record they have on the subject. It is made up from the time they commenced to keep the record until they ceased to keep it. During that time there were called here by the Government 68,694 clerks. Out of that number there were driven away from the District of Columbia by extortionate practices the enormous number of 31,962, which left to the Government a net gain in clerks of 36,732. In other words, in order to get 36,732 clerks 31,962 were driven away.

That list is as follows:

[1] Monthly report only.

Just in the few minutes I have remaining let me invite your attention to another provision, which was shown by the testimony of Mr. Charles Shreve, a real estate man, who appeared before the Senate hearing. He said:

The real estate men's bill, in that their bill states that the rent administrator may fix rentals on the application of any person in interest.

That is found in Senate hearing, part 2, page 92.

It developed in that hearing that the real estate people insisted, until they got it, that there should be an appeal to the courts. Take one of these girls in one of the departments here and compel her to go before the rent administrator, quitting her work to do it, and losing her compensation. After the rent commission has determined the "reasonable" rent to be paid, the landlord can appeal to the court, and we are told every day that the courts are two and a half years behind with their docket, and this bill goes on to specify that these appeal cases shall take the course of all other civil suits. Was that put in accidentally?

It was put in so that the act itself would say that those cases had to take their course, notwithstanding the fact that the courts are two and a half years behind with their dockets. But that is not all on that score. It provides that if the court determines the findings of the rent commission not to be what they should that it goes back to the rent commission, and then the landlord can again appeal it to the court, which is two and a half years behind. In other words, they can get five years of appeal, when the law only lasts for four years. Where is your tenant during all that time? First, your tenant has got to employ a lawyer to prepare the charges that go to the rent commission, and, next, as the bill itself says, the appeal shall be by filing a petition in court. That, of course, means that a petition, which is made necessary, has to be filed, and the tenant can not do that without a lawyer. So I say, as I said in the beginning, that this bill itself provi les the means, and then before it concludes takes away every reasonable means.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman from Michigan to give me five minutes?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I thank you, sir. The bill undertakes to say to A that if he leases premises to B that he shall not charge B more than the amount fixed by the rent commission. I am afraid that is not constitutional, and if this whole proceeding is based upon premises that are unconstitutional, all that follows it must be. The penalty in this bill for anything that may be done in violation of its provisions is a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or both.

If the rent commission fixes the rate of rental not agreed to by the tenant and the landlord before the contract was commenced, but fixed by the commission afterwards, and that tenant should take sick or any other misfortune happen to her, and she be unable to pay that rent, what is the penalty? There is only one penalty in the bill, and it is fine and imprisonment. That is reviving the old law of imprisonment for debt. The bill further provides that if any section or any provision of the bill is held to be unconstitutional it shall relate to that provision only. Therefore, it is a clear, clean-cut proposition that the penalty clause must go out as unconstitutional; and if it goes out, then there is no penalty in the bill, and then you have exactly what the real estate men want.

They pretend to be opposed to this bill, and on several occasions the lady has come pretty nearly protesting too much. But the Star is the official organ for the real estate people and you do not find the Star attacking that bill as it has attacked other bills that would really stop rent profiteering. The realters are opposed to this bill only to the extent that they are opposed to any bill upon the subject. They would rather be left without any bill; but if they are to have any bill they are not opposed to this one. The last section of the bill provides:

That it is hereby declared that the provisions of this section are made necessary by emergencies growing out of the war with the Imperial German Government, resulting—in a scarcity of housing facilities in the District of Columbia—

Listen, please—

And so forth.

So they undertake, by putting that last sentence in, to destroy the bill. That says to the court where these appeals are to go that this much be done because there is a scarcity of housing facilities in the District of Columbia. Then, those who will contest the bill will say that we undertake to do away with the law of supply and demand. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I believe I have asked leave to revise and extend my remarks, but I will not so extend. Instead, I will await another opportunity to say more on this subject.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in view of the consideration being given to the pending bill, the purpose of which is to develop and conserve an American dyestuff industry, and likewise in view of several bills reported by the Ways and Means Committee intended to develop and protect American industries, especially those that were initiated by reason of our extremity in the war, I trust it may not be regarded as an abrupt departure for me to propound to you, Why not protect potash? And have we not reached a legislative stage midway this session when it becomes permissible to inquire, Why not preserve our infant domestic potash industry from the illegitimate competition of the German potash monopoly? Our domestic industry does not seek any special or exceptional privilege or advantage not usually accorded infant industries. It does seek economic equality with other American industries of a similar character and in like condition.

But let me make it clear, it is not my intention to complain, but it is my purpose to appeal, which I do very earnestly, for relief for our domestic potash industry. It is very exigent that relief be had and that it come soon.

But first I heartily congratulate the membership of the Ways and Means Committee on what they have so far accomplished in the advancement of measures for the development, preservation, and prosperity of home industries, and I feel that they deserve the commendation of the House and of the public generally for the faithful and arduous services they have performed. The policy thus evinced to encourage and develop American industries, wisely carried out, as it will be, is bound to promote our material progress and general prosperity. Such of these bills as have already been passed in the House have received my support. The favorable reports made upon these industrial bills reasonably warrants and forecasts like favorable action of this committee on H. R. 4870, introduced by the able chairman of the committee, entitled "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to safeguard, by a license control of imports of potassium salts and by imposing an import duty thereon, the interests of domestic potash producers."

But investors in the potash industry are not seeking legislative relief merely because it is being accorded to other mineral, metal, and other kinds of industries, brought into existence or advanced by the exigencies of the war. The potash industry is willing to submit its case on its own merits, which are second to none of the several industries for which protection in some form is now in contemplation, and stand or fall thereby. It seeks only the justice which should be granted by the Government under similar circumstances.

When war was imminent and after it had commenced, the same appeals were made and the same inducements held out by the President, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the chairman of the War Trade Board, and like sanctions given by the Director of the Bureau of Geological Survey, the Director of the Bureau of Mines, the Director of the Bureau of Soils, and by other proper officials, for the production of potash as for other minerals, ores, and metals essential to the prosecution of the war.

Mr. Chairman, so grave had become the situation on account of the meager supply of potash that, in accord with the recommendation made by the President, the Congress promptly passed the act "to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium"—potash—which was approved October 2, 1917. This act provides specifically for the giving of leases on the alkaline waters of Searles Lake, Calif., for the operation of potash plants, and also provides specifically for leases on the public lands in Sweetwater County, Wyo., for potash production. On the whole, the act was intended to stimulate the production of potash in the United States by every feasible means.

Further, in behalf of the increased production of potash, the President by his proclamation delivered February 25, 1918, by authority of the act "to provide for the further national security and defense by encouraging the supply of foods, fuel, and so forth," approved August 10, 1917, declared fertilizers and their ingredients, including potash, to be essential to food production. Naturally this gave a further stimulus to the efforts made for the discovery and development of potash.

Again, on October 5, 1918, the President approved the act "to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production" of numerous minerals, ores, and chemicals, including manganese, pyrites, tungsten, and potassium—potash—and certainly this act contributed materially to efforts made for the production of potash and other things specified.

In the Agricultural appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1917 an appropriation of $175,000 was granted for the investigation and demonstration in the United States, for obtaining the best method of producing potash on a commercial scale from kelp, and to establish a plant or plants for that purpose. Again, in the Agricultural appropriation bill for the fiscal year of 1919, it was provided that so much of that appropriation of $175,000 as remained unexpended be reappropriated for a continuance of the experiment. But I should state that the experiments with kelp commenced in 1911 and have since continued.

Many more inducements were offered and appeals made in behalf of the production of potash and other war essentials, but I shall not now further specify what they were.

Mr. Chairman, what was the result of all these governmental appeals made and legislative acts passed to promote and increase the production of potash? The answer is, the effect was most gratifying, both in new discoveries made of potash resources and in the quantity produced. Geologists, mineralogists, miners, prospectors, and citizens generally promptly responded, to the end that a famine in potash and other minerals and materials useful in peace and essential in war might be averted.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. I will.

Mr. CRISP. Did not these same patriotic gentlemen charge from $4 to $6 a unit when before the war the farmers got potash at 75 cents a unit, and will not the fact we increase the tariff on potash increase the cost of producing vegetables and food supplies and increase the cost of living to people living in the cities rather than reduce it?

Mr. KINKAID. I answer the gentleman by saying that the high price of potash was brought about directly by the course of the German potash monopoly and the indulgence extended to it for years when America was sleeping on its opportunity to itself develop the industry. That was the reason that potash sold for $6 when it should have been sold for $1.50, or perhaps $1, and it is just a recurrence of such an extremity as that which the Fordney bill would prevent.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield to another question?

Mr. KINKAID. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman has held up the bugaboo about wanting to stop the German from coming in. Is it not true that the former German field—Alsace-Lorraine—is now the property of France, and if we thought sufficiently well of France to send our money and soldiers over there to assist her, would it not be a friendly act to have some commercial dealings with her?

Mr. KINKAID. I will answer my friend that, unfortunately, it is not true that the Alsace-Lorraine potash belongs to France.

Mr. CRISP. I will take issue with the gentleman. It does.

Mr. KINKAID. The owners are German, and it is under their individual control. My latest information is, and I think it is up to date, that it belongs to Germans, and that they boast that they will still control these mines. Germany is now trying to throttle development of the potash industry in the United States, just as it has always done, and just as it diligently tried to prevent the development of the industry for years previous to the war.

Mr. GARNER. Would the gentleman mind? There is a diversity of controversy here as to the ownership of the Alsace-Lorraine mines. The Ways and Means Committee have had hearings on the subject, and a man who has returned from there inside of 40 days gave us information. Would the gentleman mind giving the source of his information to the House?

Mr. KINKAID. My informant is the former chief of the fertilizer branch of the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Brown.

Mr. GARNER. Has he been over in France and did he secure this information there?

Mr. KINKAID. No; but he is about as up to date as anybody can be, because that is his calling, and he is up on potash questions.

Mr. GARNER. The Department of Commerce sent a man over there, and he reported back that those mines were under control of the French people, and that potash could be shipped from Alsace-Lorraine as cheaply as it could from Germany or any other place.

Mr. KINKAID. However, I regard that as wholly immaterial. The United States, having boundless resources of potash, would be untrue to its own interest if it did not develop that industry and keep itself self-sustaining and independent, as far as potash is concerned, of foreign countries. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will my friend yield?

Mr. KINKAID. I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In the first place, I am unable to agree with the gentleman from Texas as to the information in the hearings. It did develop there that the French had legal control over the mines, and I do not remember that anything was stated in the hearings as to just what capital was operating them. But still more important than that, as the gentleman is well aware, there is still in German territory, as left to Germany at the present day, very large and extensive deposits of potash that are claimed to be richer than those of Alsace-Lorraine.

Mr. KINKAID. I prefer American potash to French potash, if they may have it to spare, and especially do I prefer it to German potash, and in general in preference to the potash of any other country. And I prefer the American industry and the interests of American labor to that of any other country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. Will my friend yield?

Mr. KINKAID. I will.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman prefers Nebraska potash to California potash, does he not?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. KINKAID. May I have a few minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. KINKAID. This is not a Nebraska question, a California question, a Georgia question, a down-South or up-North question, but it is an American question; and if we are true to the welfare of our country, when we have this great resource lying dormant, if we are true to the future of our country and the welfare of all of our citizens, we will do what we can in a reasonable way to develop and preserve the industry. [Applause on the Republican side.] And we will prevent a recurrence of that extremity which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has referred to, namely, potash at $6 a unit.

Resuming, the testimony of Mr. W. E. Sharp, president of one of the largest potash companies, shows that "6,000 of the Nebraska citizens poured in their money to hasten quantity production of potash." "Great hordes of men worked feverishly day and night to erect mammoth plants and thereafter to operate them."

The reports of the hearings further show that nearly $50,000,000 has been invested in the potash industry in America. (See committee hearings on H. R. 4870, p. 271.) Of this $50,000,000, from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 has been invested in plants and the development of the industry in the sand hills of western Nebraska.

In the United States there were more than 150 plants and factories manufacturing potash when the armistice was signed, which includes all the sources of potash. In Nebraska there were 9 large plants and from 15 to 20 smaller plants. These plants have 260 miles of 8 and 6-inch pipe line which have 26,000 wells connected up. These fine plants cost all the way from $600,000 to $1,500,000 each, and the 16 smaller plants all the way from $15,000 to $20,000 up to $100,000 each, according to statements made by Mr. Sharp, of Lincoln, Nebr. (Hearings before the Committee on Mines and Mining, Senate on S. 5557.)

At Searles Lake, Calif., are two very large plants and a third partly constructed. Utah has five large plants, and there are plants in Colorado, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. In all, there are more than 150 plants for the production of potash from American sources.

In Nebraska, the origin of the towns of Hoffland and Antioch, with a population of about 1,500 each, was due wholly to the establishment of potash plants on their sites. Likewise, the growth of the hitherto crossroads town of Lakeside to a population of 1,000 is due wholly to the development of the potash industry there.

The Great Western Sugar Co. has expended almost $500,000 in its plants at Gering and Scottsbluff, Nebr., in equipping to produce potash from Steffens water, a by-product of sugar beets. This company has also similarly equipped plants in some of its Colorado sugar-beet factories, and while it produced at the rate of 6,000 tons of pure potash in 1918, it is prepared to greatly increase this amount in the near future. There are more than 100 sugar-beet factories in the United States, which if properly equipped might produce potash in the same proportion.

The production of potash in the United States in 1918 was 60,000 tons of pure potash. The estimated consumption for the next few years is 100,000 tons, for fertilizer purposes.

So far the Nebraska plants have yielded the largest potash production. For the first six months of 1918 the Nebraska lakes yielded 43,219 tons of potash salts, equivalent to 10,232 tons of actual potash, which shows progressive and rapid development.

Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the generous, energetic, and loyal responses to the appeals of the Government for an increased production of potash in the United States, notwithstanding the large amounts of money invested, and notwithstanding the rapid developments made, both in the discoveries of potash resources, and especially in its increased production, the industry and the investors therein now confront bankruptcy unless legislation be granted to safeguard them against the illegitimate competition of the German potash monopoly. Besides expending their own money the investors have found it necessary to borrow large sums, and must now meet the obligations they have incurred.

Contemporaneously with the signing of the armistice the demand for our domestic potash ceased because of the prospects that the importation of German potash into the United States would soon be resumed, as had been the practice before the war, when there was no domestic product.

For a time the stronger companies tried to stem the difficulty, hoping to survive until relief could be afforded by the Congress, but several months ago even these stronger companies, who were running with very heavy expenses for production without being able to make sale of any of the product, found themselves obliged to give up further expenditures and operations and shut down their plants.

Mr. Chairman, why depend upon Germany for potash when we have an abundance at home? The reports of the hearings on the Fordney bill show that it is the opinion of experts that enough potash can be derived from the leucite rock in the State of Wyoming alone for home consumption for the next 800 years. Adding to this what may be said to be in sight in other geological resources, it is fair to say there is enough potash recoverable from the earth to last 2,000 years without counting on probable new discoveries. Then adding to geological sources the great by-products resources and the kelp resources, we are fully warranted in assuming that all these combined potash resources are abundantly adequate to meet the wants of home consumption interminably.

Mr. Chairman, I think it will be patent to all who have given the question attention that the potash industry in the United States can not be possibly resumed and continued without being safeguarded against unfair competition with the German product. Both German and Alsatian potash are now being offered in America at from $1.50 to $1.70 per unit. Before the war the importations were sold at about 80 cents per unit, but it is estimated that due to the higher cost of labor and increased railway freight rates in Germany, as well as an increase of ocean freight rates, that the German potash is not likely to fall back to prewar prices. In fact, it is probable that prices will be maintained for an indefinite time at a higher level than that which prevailed before the war.

As all know, the American potash industry has been developed on a war-price basis for all necessary materials and labor required, with the result that during the war the production of pure potash cost about $4 per unit. The consequence is the American producers can not hope to break even on any surplus remaining in their hands after the signing of the armistice.

But the showings are conclusive that potash can now be produced in the United States and put on the market at $2.50 per unit, and accordingly American producers have proposed to the Ways and Means Committee, as the hearings will show, that the legislation they seek may provide that the maximum price to be paid per unit for their potash for the next year shall not exceed $2.50 per unit; but the act will leave it in the discretion of the Government officials or commission, as the case may be, to fix a lower price than $2.50 per unit when it may seem reasonable to do so.

Mr. Chairman, as an admission of the existing moral obligation of the Government to preserve those who so generously responded to the appeals made for the increased production of minerals, metals, ores, and other things necessary to the winning of the war, I cite the act of Congress approved March 2, 1917, "to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes." The act authorizes the Secretary of the Interior—to adjust, liquidate, and pay such net losses as have been suffered by any person, firm, or corporation by reason of producing or preparing to produce either manganese, chrome, pyrites, or tungsten in compliance with the request or demand of the Department of the Interior, the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the Shipping Board, or the Emergency Fleet Corporation to supply the urgent needs of the Nation in the prosecution of the war, said minerals being enumerated in the act of Congress approved October 5, 1918, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

Eight million five hundred thousand dollars is appropriated by this act from which to reimburse for such expenses and losses in producing the minerals, metals, and ores specified, also expenses and losses sustained by those who contracted with the Government for the manufacture of equipment, material, supplies, etc., for war purposes. Adjustments of the claims under this act are now in progress, and the awards being made are to be paid out of the $8,500,000 appropriation. The producers of potash laudably and courageously have not sought governmental relief in the form provided by this act; but by reason of the phenomenal success they have made in the disclosures of potash resources and increased production they are convinced that the industry can be made permanent and profitable by the enactment of legislation which will preserve them from illegitimate German competition for but the short period of two years. They therefore seek the safeguarding of this infant industry in some form for this short time, and the license scheme provided in the Fordney bill will be acceptable to them.

In accordance with this commendable attitude of producers there was introduced in the Senate during the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress Senate bill 5557 by Senator HENDERSON, and the Hon. Franklin K. Lane, the Secretary of the Interior, on February 12, 1919, wrote the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining a letter giving the provisions of this bill his unqualified indorsement. The letter from Secretary Lane to Senator HENDERSON reads as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 12, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR HENDERSON: In reply to your letter of February 8, requesting an opinion with regard to the Senate bill No. 5557, for the encouragement of the domestic production of potash. The need for such legislation lies in the fact that national necessity and high prices have led to the investment of a very large amount of capital (a minimum of at least twenty-five to thirty million dollars) in the development of this new industry.

Before the war potash salts were the most bulky of all overseas mineral imports, amounting to approximately 1,000,000 tons a year. It was the most important world mineral entirely controlled by Germany. The supply for fertilizer uses in this country was practically entirely cut off at the beginning of the European war. No adequate substitute for potash has been developed during this period of shortage.

The possible sources of potash supply in the United States were not very promising from a commercial standpoint in normal times. However, exploration of deposits, the development of new processes for treatment, and the investment of large amounts of capital have now brought the industry to a state which is more encouraging for the commercial production of a large part of our requirements. Potash can be produced from a wide variety of sources, including natural deposits and as a by-product in many industries. The supply of raw materials is practically unlimited. Some of the possible sources could supply the entire requirements of the United States for many years. The natural deposits at Searles Lake, Calif., the saline lakes of Nebraska, leucite rock in Wyoming, alunite in Utah, greensands, potash-bearing shale and feldspars in the Eastern United States; the potash recoverable from the dust in cement plants and blast furnaces, and from the wastes in beet-sugar plants, and from other industries represent a wide variety of important sources. Production from many of these sources is just emerging from the experimental stage, and the dumping on the market of cheap potash from foreign sources would tend to kill an industry which with a reasonable amount of encouragement may become a large and permanent one.

I believe that the proposed bill is necessary to insure a market for the domestic product for a sufficient period of time to give an opportunity for the improvement of processes, the recovery of by-products, and the reduction of costs which will ultimately permit competition with foreign sources of supply. If such action is not taken the large amount of invested capital and the experimental work which has been done may be largely lost.

The method proposed to insure a market for the domestic output by licensing imports imposes the least financial burden on the country by permitting the import of as much foreign material as is required at the cheapest prices obtainable, while at the same time providing for the distribution of the domestic material at higher prices. The average price from the two sources should not represent any undue burden.

I believe that there are many factors which make the situation with regard to potash peculiar, and especially deserving of such action. In the case of potash the resources in the natural deposits and by-products are sufficient as a basis for a permanent industry. This is not true of many of the other war minerals. More complicated methods and more extensive plants are required for the production of potash than in those minerals where the operation is purely of a mining character, following well-known and accepted methods. The chances are better for the improvement of methods and the reduction of costs to a basis where competition with foreign material is possible. The amount of capital invested is probably greater than in any other new "war mineral" industry. The transportation problem, while an important factor, is not so acute as in many of the other minerals, and may be partially overcome by the concentration of the material into a high-grade product. Furthermore, the development of potash is important now, not as a war measure but as a peace measure for the primary purpose of increasing agricultural production as well as affording a supply for other domestic uses in the future. I am clearly of the opinion that this measure should be confined exclusively to potash.

I direct particular attention to the memorandum prepared in the Geological Survey covering the potash situation and the importance of legislation for its encouragement.

I wish to express my approval of the bill and hope that favorable action will be taken with regard to it.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Hon. CHARLES B. HENDERSON,
United States Senate.

That same Senate bill also received the indorsement of the Secretary of Agriculture and the chairman of the War Trade Board, as well as the official sanctions or indorsements of the directors of the Geological Survey, the Bureau of Mines, and the Bureau of Soils.

I desire to call attention to the contents of a letter written Col. Myron M. Parker, Washington, D. C., attorney for the National Potash Association, by Hon. Willis L. Moore, for 18 years Chief of the United States Weather Bureau, and once Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, but now a farmer and fruit raiser on a large scale, with his post office at Rockville, Md. This letter expresses his firm support of the conservation of our domestic potash industry. The letter reads as follows:

MOORELAND FARM,
Rockville, Md., June 27, 1919.

Col. MYRON M. PARKER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLONEL: The National Grange comes closer to the farmer than any other organization of farmers. It is composed of real farmers, and its organization is extensive. I am a member of the grange at Alvey, Md.

For 18 years I was Chief of the United States Weather Bureau, and also an Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, and for 13 years I have owned and personally operated a large fruit, grain, and stock farm at Rockville, Md. My interests are therefore wholly with the betterment of the agricultural conditions of the Nation.

One of the things that seems to me to be imperative is that the beginning that the United States has made as a necessity of war in the manufacture of potash should continue until this country becomes independent of Germany or any other nation in the supplying of this absolutely necessary fertilizer. Every farseeing farmer will willingly pay whatever price is necessary to protect this new American industry, to the end that we may become independent of other countries and ultimately get the American product cheaper than it can be shipped to us from abroad. No doubt the Germans will sell to us as soon as trade relations are resumed at less than the cost to the manufacturer in this country, but, as a farmer, I know that as soon as the American manufacturer is driven out of business and his plants destroyed the price of the foreign potash will go to an altitude beyond that which is now necessary to protect the American producers of this farm necessity. The price of food is not only high, but it will stay high for years to come, and I know that I and other farmers can use potash at the present price at a profit to ourselves, and the home industry of manufacturing potash be developed to the time when a healthy American competition will give us this commodity as cheap as it can be produced and shipped to us from over the seas.

Above all we should not adopt any shortsighted policy that will ever again put this country at the mercy of a foreign country for our supply of this plant food, especially if that country is now an enemy or is ever likely to become one.

Very respectfully,

WILLIS L. MOORE.

The New York Sun, in its issue of June 11 of this year, contained an article earnestly advocating the preservation of our domestic industries developed by the war, including potash. It reads:

ONCE WAR, NOW PEACE, INDUSTRIES.

The Congress hearings have begun on tariff questions, which should be settled straightway. While the war was on hundreds of millions of American capital went into the manufacture of dyestuffs, because this country was destitute of them and could not obtain them in any other way. Hundreds of millions likewise went into potash, nitrate, manganese, and magnesite products. These, at the time, were war industries pure and simple. Some of them were as essential to our victory abroad and to our safety at home as shells from the munition plants and ships from the shipbuilding plants.

But, with the war over, unlike shrapnel, bayonets, and torpedoes, they still are indispensable to our national security and national welfare. Whether by war of arms or by war of trade or by whatever circumstances this Nation of 110,000,000 people, in 48 State groupings, some of them bigger, richer, and more populous than kingdoms and republics of the Old World, must never again be caught unprepared to supply itself out of its vast resources with the basic needs of industries and the basic needs of foods as imperatively required by our national life as the water we drink and the air we breathe.

If, with our tariff laws and with whatever other action may be necessary, we do not preserve forever the industries which we did not possess before the war, but which we do now possess in almost full perfection, it will not be merely political ingratitude, it will be national lunacy.

Mr. Chairman, I have used the term "illegitimate German competition," meaning in the sale of German potash in our American market. I desire to say I have so used the words advisedly, for I do not regard it as fair and just to our domestic potash industry, having been brought into existence by the circumstance of war with Germany, provoked by its own hostilities, followed by its own embargo placed upon the exportation of potash into the United States and other countries, as a war measure, coupled with the further circumstance, very repellent, that the identical potash which Germany would now ship into the United States was produced in the German mines by prisoners of war. Who dare say that competition under such circumstances would be legitimate? Unrestricted German competition is repulsive for the additional reason that, in a legal sense, Germany has maliciously endeavored to stifle the development of the potash industry in the United States by intrigue, intimidation, and dumping. The great Kali Syndicate, composed of German stockholders, with the German Government itself interested, in order to save the sacrifice incident to a dumping policy, has tried to intimidate American investors from making developments of potash.

Mr. Harry O. Tucker, a representative of the American Trona Co., at Searles Lake, Calif., has made affidavit to the visit of one Paul Freudrichsen upon his company several times in the direct interests of this German Kali Syndicate for the Western States and Hawaii. These visits were made during the three or four months immediately preceding the declaration of war.

The affidavit further describes, in substance, the persistent efforts made by this agent of the German syndicate to both discourage and intimidate the Trona Co. from its undertaking to produce potash. I shall not take time to here read the affidavit, but it will be copied with my remarks.

[See p. 201 of committee hearings H. R. 4870.]

I, Harry O. Tucker, being first duly sworn, depose and say that I am a resident of Los Angeles, Calif., and the traffic manager of the American Trona Corporation, which owns and operates a potash reduction plant at Trona, Searles Lake, Calif., with an investment of approximately $5,000,000; that Paul Freudrichsen, whose official title is propaganda manager for the German Kali Syndicate for the Western States and Hawaii, came into the office of the Trona Corporation at different times during the three or four months immediately preceding the United States entering the World War, and stated in the presence of Mr. Ernest Gordon, assistant secretary and assistant treasurer of the American Trona Corporation, also in the presence of the affiant, that the stockholders of the American Trona Corporation were foolish and unwise to invest their money in a potash-reduction enterprise in the United States for the reason that the German Kali Syndicate and the Imperial German Government would after the conclusion of the war absolutely destroy the American potash industry by marketing the German potash in the United States at such low figures as to absolutely preclude and bar any and all competition; that the German Kali Syndicate and the Imperial German Government absolutely controlled the potash production and market of the world, and pictured in great detail the immensity and strength of the German Kali Syndicate, governmentally controlled, and stated that it was useless and futile for any potash-reduction enterprise in the United States to undertake to compete with the German potash, for said syndicate and the Imperial German Government intended to destroy all competition; that said Freudrichsen had no apparent reason for coming to the American Trona Corporation offices except to communicate above statements on behalf of the German Kali Syndicate; that the affiant was personally present and heard above statements in at least one of the said interviews, and personally knows of said Freudrichsen making other visits to said offices for the same purposes, it being at that time freely discussed by Mr. Gordon, the affiant, and other officers and employees of the American Trona Corporation; that said Freudrichsen was, by his statements aforesaid and his general conduct and bearing and ostentation endeavoring to dishearten, discourage, threaten, and intimidate the officers and stockholders of the American Trona Corporation in the matter of their proceeding with the development of potash production from the almost inexhaustible potash deposits of Lake Searles, Calif.; that the German Kali Syndicate maintains five offices in the United States as centers of propaganda work, and that the said Freudrichsen was connected with and operated from the San Francisco office, the other offices being at New York City, Chicago, Atlanta, and New Orleans, respectively; that in affiant's judgment the aforesaid conduct, attitude, tactics, threats, and intimidations were but a part and parcel of a general, insidious, and subtle program and system of propaganda carried on and conducted by said syndicate over the United States during the war and for the purposes aforesaid.

HARRY O. TUCKER.

Sworn and subscribed to before me this 7th day of February, 1919.

[SEAL.] MYRON M. CADY, Notary Public.

One Emery, at Bradford, Pa., as far back as 1902, engaged in the manufacture of oxalic acid from potash. His production was sold in 1902 at 16 cents per pound, but dumping from Germany forced the price down to less than 5 cents per pound. Emery persisted in his efforts to survive this competition, with the result that he lost in 1902, $28,692; in 1910, $45,278.53; in 1911, $12,897.18; in 1912, $84,047.48; in 1913, $36,936.11; and in 1914, $56,465.67. These losses resulted in the Emery manufactory being sold at sheriff's sale.

In the testimony given by Witness Dow, of the Dow Chemical Co., of Midland, Mich., manufacturers of pure pharmaceutical potassium carbonate, he stated as follows:

In the one particular instance where we did fight the German 10 or 12 years ago we were making it very much cheaper than they were making it in Germany, but they sold it in the United States for not only less than the cost, but for practically the cost of bringing it from Hamburg and distributing it in the United States. It was not a question of realizing any price at all in Germany.

But the adjustment of railway freight rates to the exigencies of the German expenses of potash transportation have helped to make competition with them disadvantageous and unequal. The report of Thompson, of Chicago, on railway statistics shows that Germany, owning 95 per cent of her railroads, has given cheaper freight rates for the export of German productions than on products for home consumption to seaboard points. Their railway policy has been to operate for the protection of German industries, both to discourage imports and encourage exports.

In the report of the committee hearings on page 129 is contained the admission of Herr Schneddekopf, director general of the potash syndicate, that the question of forestalling or stifling the development of the potash industry in the United States was given consideration by the German potash syndicate eight years or more ago. His statement reads:

Over eight years ago the German Kali Works definitely decided not to do anything to interfere with the development of any legitimate potash industry in the United States. This plan has been strictly adhered to. (See pp. 129, committee hearings, H. R. 4870.)

I quote next the statement made by the eminent German scholar, Mr. Wilhelm Ostwald, winner of the Nobel prize in 1909:

America went into the war like a man with a rope around his neck, which is in the enemy's hands and is pretty tightly drawn. With its tremendous deposits, Germany has a world monopoly in potash, a point of immense value, which can not be reckoned too highly when once this war is going to be settled. It is in Germany's power to dictate which of the nations shall have plenty of food and which shall starve. Germany is in the position often realized by Bismarck, to handle the long arm of the lever. The dearth of potash as well as the ever-increasing results of the U-boat war is working in Germany's favor.

From the showings made and much more that we know besides it seems clear that it has been and will be the purpose of Germany to stifle the potash industry in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, it ought to be self-evident that the development of the potash industry in America will be competition making. In fact, that is just what Germany would prevent and what America needs. But some seem to fear that with our domestic product gaining the ascendency over that imported from foreign countries a monopoly in the industry may be created here at home. I am frank to say, for my part, if a monopoly in the industry is to occur anywhere I should rather patronize an American than a foreign monopoly. But my purpose is to call attention to the strong improbability that any monopoly in the production of potash would ever develop in the United States, even with foreign importations wholly shut out.

The difficulty in the way of monopoly in the United States is that the resources of this mineral are so widely distributed geographically over the United States. The mineral has been found in the East, Northeast, Southeast, West, Southwest, Northwest, and on the Pacific coast. The differences in the distances for transportation to consumers afford bases for competition. But another feature is the variety of sources from which potash salts are derived. Hitherto it has been extracted principally from the alkaline waters in the Nebraska and California lakes, but later large contributions will come from what is taken from potash mines. Besides this, sugar-beet factories, cement plants, and blast furnaces will make their contributions from their by-products, and last, but not least of any, we have overlooked the kelp source, which is being developed by Government appropriations. Now, is it not plain that this great variety of conditions must constantly preserve a strife to excel respectively?

Mr. Chairman, America's neglect to promote development of a variety of its mineral resources before the war was the less excusable because of the magnificent results achieved by the policy of fostering in their infant stage the manufactures of steel, tin-plate, beet sugar, and other industries.

Long since America became the greatest producer, both of steel and tin plate, of any nation, and its home market for both is admittedly the greatest of any in the world.

Due to the start given the production of beet sugar by fixing a bounty, paid by the National Government, also by some of the States for its production, and subsequently by a duty imposed by Congress upon its importation from foreign countries, the growing of beets and their manufacture into sugar, after an unsuccessful struggle of from 60 to 70 years, gained a permanent foothold in the United States.

Without these three industries thus developed America would have been placed at a still greater disadvantage in the World War than what proved to be the case. It is plain that without our great steel factories we could not have constructed for war purposes, as we did, so many miles of railways in France, equipped with the best quality of steel rails and the highest class of rolling stock for freight. Without our tin-plate manufactories we could not have commanded the tin plate required for the manufacture of receptacles with which to carry meats, vegetables, and other foods to our soldiers overseas.

And while passing we should not forget those large pay rolls of the steel and tin-plate manufactories and the relatively smaller, though yet large, monthly or weekly pay rolls in the aggregate of the more than 100 sugar-beet factories in the United States. Such productions and such pay rolls contribute to the contentment of labor, happy homes, and national prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, it is plain that the same fostering policy accorded to potash must produce the same rich results.

It is reliably estimated that the United States for the next year would be able to produce about one-third of the potash required for our domestic consumption, and the Fordney bill contemplates that licenses would be granted under the act for the importation of the remaining two-thirds, conditioned that the importer be required to buy of the American product an amount equal to 50 per cent of the amount imported at a reasonable price, to be ascertained by the representative of our Government.

In other words, that two units of the foreign potash at the price of $1.50 per unit be combined with one unit of American potash at $2.50 per unit and the potash then be sold to the American consumer at the average price of the three units, which would be $1.83 per unit. Figuring on this present basis of prices of foreign potash at $1.50 and domestic potash at $2.50, both of which prices will be inevitably reduced before long, the American industry can be preserved and become permanent. This means that it would cost the American consumer 33 cents more per unit for the time being than if permitted to buy imported potash at $1.50 per unit.

Mr. Chairman, is it not to the financial interest of every consumer of potash to pay a price therefor adequate to protect our own infant industry in order that we may become independent of foreign countries, and thus in a short time buy the home product cheaper than it would be shipped to us from abroad? Of course, with the American industry effectually strangled, the price of the foreign product will be as high as our consumers will stand.

But under the license scheme provided by the Fordney bill, the price of the combined American and German productions will gradually become reduced, and if the same should start upon the enactment of the measure at the price of $1.83 per unit, that price is sure to be gradually reduced, and it might be at the end of a year reduced to $1.50 per unit, and at the end of two years to possibly $1 per unit. It is plain that the enforced commercial combination of the American and German products would not tend to promote effort for a joint monoply. The strife for a survival of the fittest would yet exist, with the hope in each for ultimate ascendancy in the American market.

I here quote from an impartial authority in the form of an excerpt taken from a report made by the Bureau of United States Geological Survey. It is headed "Statement showing the almost inexhaustible American potash deposits by processes recently developed will in two years enable American producers to successfully compete with German potash syndicate."

New and more economical methods of potash reduction recently developed have revolutionized the American potash production, which is now in the transitional stage from the old to the new processes, and if the industry be safeguarded temporarily it can in two years successfully compete with the German potash syndicate.

I submit this is a very encouraging statement. The fact that it is purely official and not prepared for the occasion should give it great weight. This same paper further shows that the total American potash production in 1918 was about 60,000 tons of pure potash, or one-fourth of the total prewar importation of 240,000 tons, of which 180,000 tons were used with fertilizers. But it must be remembered that the production was greatly reduced by reason of many plants shutting down after the expiration of the first six months of 1918, due to the prospects of early importations of German potash.

Lower prices will be promoted of our domestic product, both by increased productions, improved processes, and better economies in every detail. For instance, it has been argued to the Ways and Means Committee that one reason why the American product can not compete with foreign importations is because of the greater cost in railway rates from the interior of the United States to the consumer than the amount of short-distance railway rates in Germany and France to the seaboard, thence low ocean rates to Atlantic seaboard points. It is true the cost per ton in the shipment of potash salts in Nebraska to the terminal market points in the East has been $13 per ton; but, surprising as it may seem, 75 per cent of this freight cost can be eliminated, and this will be accomplished by the separation of the pure potash from the gross potash salts, which pure production will weigh but one-fourth of the gross. Lower-priced coal and oil used as fuel, and lower-priced machinery and materials of all kinds, will contribute to a lowering of the price of the domestic product. The authority can be invoked under the license system to reduce the price as often and as fast as the cost of production may warrant. All competent authorities who have investigated the subject concur that by increasing productions and improving modes of operation in general and with lower cost of freight and materials, the American product can be made to compete successfully with the foreign product.

Mr. Chairman, it is a regrettable fact that when the war began there was no American production of potash, and it required almost two years before a single American plant passed beyond the experimental stage to a commercial basis.

It is plain that while the deft hand of Germany had been insidiously at work securing a strong grasp on our industrial pursuits, America was asleep to its own opportunity and welfare while its birthright was being stolen by the country then and thereby preparing to be its enemy in the most gigantic and dreadful war the world has ever known. It will be patent to everyone that the American money paid for German potash constituted a contribution to the purchase of guns, munitions, and submarines wherewith to wage war, and that the United States became correspondingly less prepared for war by having no domestic potash industry of its own.

Mr. Chairman, while America may be pardoned in a measure on account of its ignorance of its potash resources for not developing the industry before the war, to now with knowledge of its extensive potash resources refuse to preserve the industry would constitute unpardonable economic folly and prodigality.

If the home industry by reason of ruthless German competition is to be shut out of our American market, the effect is to favor German labor at the expense of American labor. All the millions paid to Germany for its potash will be promotive of idle labor in America and greater prosperity in Germany.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the United States has become thoroughly committed to the development and manufacture of potash as a permanent industry by what it has done therefor during the war, but I urge that we had equally pledged our country to make the production of potash permanent before the war, and before war with Germany was expected. In 1911 we began in earnest to make explorations for potash in its natural form in the earth through the Bureau of Geological Survey, making annual appropriations of $20,000 for the direct search of potash alone. At the same time annual appropriations were made for investigations to be conducted by the Bureau of Soils how to ascertain the best mode of producing potash upon a commercial basis, including experiments in extracting potash from kelp. Appropriations for these two bureaus for this purpose have continued to be made annually since 1911 to the present time, including $175,000 appropriated for experiments with kelp by the Bureau of Soils made in 1917, with a reappropriation made this session of the unexpended portion of this $175,000 for further experimenting with kelp.

Mr. Chairman, how would it look, what kind of a record would it make, after all of these investigations, experiments, and many expenditures, to now yield up to Germany the production of the potash America is to consume? Why make all this great effort and large expenditure to discover how the industry may be developed and "put upon a commercial basis" if it was not the purpose to utilize the ascertainment? Why learn how to do it if it is not going to be done?

Mr. Chairman, I maintain the Government is morally obligated to now safeguard the industry, developed and advanced pursuant to the appeals made and the inducements held out by the administration so to do that we might win the war, including the appeals made by Cabinet officers, the heads of bureaus, the three acts of Congress which I have already specified, and the proclamations of the President made in accordance with the same. The act passed to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the war, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to liquidate and pay net losses suffered by persons by reason of producing manganese, chrome, pyrites, and tungsten, and providing $8,500,000 therefor, is in point in principle.

Mr. Chairman, the alternatives are, on the one hand, adequate restrictions upon importations from Germany to permit of the development of the industry in America, or, on the other, that we permit Germany to reestablish and enjoy a perpetual potash monopoly in the United States.

Will not America preserve its national self-respect by emancipating its agriculture, now involved, from slavery to Germany? Shall we prefer the prosperity of labor in Germany to the welfare of labor in America? Shall we have potash "made in Germany" or potash made in America? Shall we prefer the profit of the German merchant marine rather than to sustain our present unprofitable American railways, with their employees now asking an increased wage or a lower cost of living? Shall we stand for American industrial independence or for slavery to Germany?

Mr. Chairman, protection of our domestic potash industry is bound to be sooner or later afforded in some form. To prevent the loss of millions, relief should be afforded now. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, there have been in the history of the world three great and memorable speeches made and all at certain crises. One was the speech of Mark Anthony over the dead body of Cæsar; the other was the famous speech by Patrick Henry, wherein he evolved and brought forth the beautiful idea of liberty or death; the third speech I am about to read in the time granted to me by the chairman of the committee.

I read:

A WORD OF WARNING FROM THE DEMOCRATIC SOUTH.

[Speech on league of nations by Hon. Thomas Watson, of Georgia, before 10,000 people at Harlem, Ga., reported in Columbia Sentinel, Harlem, Ga.]

"In the league, the great charter is engulfed, the sovereignty of the people disappears, and a universal monarchy is at last established.

"The council of the league will absorb within itself judicial power, legislative power, and executive power.

"It will be a supreme court of the world, a supreme legislature of the world, a supreme executive of the world.

"It will evolve its own army, its own treasury, its own system of finance, its own civil service.

"It will have in its hands both the purse and the sword, and nowhere on earth will there be a power to veto its measures or resist its usurpations.

"It will be another Venetian council of ten, meeting in secret, and despotically ruling not one small State but every State.

"It pretends to assimilate the yellow race, the brown race, the black race, and the white race.

"It pretends to harmonize democracy with imperialism, the kings with the republics.

"It pretends to reconcile the Buddhist with the Confucianist, the Mohammedan with the Christian.

"It pretends to make a seamless garment out of 33 variegated pieces.

"It pretends to expect international melody out of 33 discordant national notes.

"If its real purpose is to put an end to just such disorder as the American colonists created, and the French created, and the South Americans created when they broke the yoke of tyrannical kings, then the league will be a success.

"If the real purpose is to create an international guaranty and collection agency for the great bankers and bondholders of indebted nations, then the league will be a success.

"If the real purpose is to permanently fasten the yoke of the conquerors upon Egypt, Asia Minor, Africa, India, Oceanica, and the greater part of China, then the league will be a success.

"The President of the United States had no authority to make a new government for this country—but so far as his signature and official conduct could commit you to it he has done so.

"Sworn to defend, protect, and preserve your supreme law, he has usurped the authority to make a new law which your supreme law must obey, which your Government must obey, and which the people must obey.

"He, your agent, sells you into foreign bondage.

"He, the representative of your Government, signs away your Government into subordination to foreign Governments.

"The President admits that we will lose our independence in the league. Therefore he himself admits that he went to France and surrendered the very thing that our soldier boys fought and died to maintain. The martyrs of the Revolutionary War died in vain; the 50,000 martyrs of the Great War of 1914 died in vain. One man has betrayed everything that those martyrs won!

"The President says he will appeal to the country against the Senators who are battling to save our constitutional liberties and our national independence.

"An appeal to the country is just what the country wants.

"The country wants just such an appeal to it as Washington and Madison made in 1787, when they asked authority to amend the articles of the old confederation.

"The country wants such an appeal to it as was made when the present Constitution was referred to the States for discussion and ratification.

"The country wants an appeal to it similar to those made when each of the amendments were adopted by the votes of the people.

"Give the people a chance to vote on this league!

"The question can't be settled by speeches; it must go to the polls!

"The President says he will appeal to the country by making 50 speeches.

"Dadburn his 50 speeches!

"The whole world is sick and tired of his everlasting speeches.

"What the people want is a fair chance to make some speeches themselves.

"They've been bulldozed and gagged so long that they have an accumulated surplus of speeches to dispose of.

"Plague on this eternal flow of presidential rhetoric!

"We want to vote!

"Why is President Wilson afraid to refer this change of government to the people whose vital interests are involved?

"Let him divide the questions, because they are two different propositions.

"Let him separate the league from the treaty!

"The two have no business together.

"It was an artifice, and a very dishonest one, to so entangle the peace treaty with the league that they can hardly be separated except by the men who entangled them.

"Let the treaty stand on its merits in the Senate, and let the league go before the people as a separate proposition.

"What objection can be urged?

"They may say a popular vote on the league would delay the treaty; but one answer to that is that our Government went swiftly into the war, on a congressional resolution; and if it wants to it can quickly come out in the same way.

"Besides, American independence, which cost a war of seven years, ought not to be surrendered as hurriedly as though it were never worth the Revolutionary struggle.

"It is high time the voters of this Republic were allowed to take a hand in their governmental affairs.

"We have never had an administration whose methods were so full of secrecy, duplicity, favoritism for the lords of special privilege.

"No other administration ever showed such a fixed purpose to shut out the people from knowledge of what was going on behind the scenes, and to shut them off from any real influence over the policies of the Government.

"The people are now told that they shall have no chance to vote on the league, no right to self-determination, and no opportunity to effectively antagonize the men who propose to transfer our independence to a supreme council seated in Europe.

"Already Wilson has bound us to keep an army on the Rhine for 15 years. Already he has sent America to the Danube. Already he has sent an army into Silesia and another into Siberia.

"Already President Wilson is spreading the American Army over Europe and into Asia.

"In the name of the Creator that made us, when and where is this Wilsonian madness to stop?

"Never before in the history of the human race has any one man arrogated to himself the right to revolutionize the government of a people, unless he came as a foreign conqueror with a sword in his hand.

"It is an amazing thing, a monstrous thing, an almost incredible thing, that a President of the United States should appoint himself a minister to a European peace conference, should leave the country and be gone seven months, should secretly spend a hundred million dollars of the people's money while secretly juggling with foreign politicians, and should then come home bringing what he calls a peace treaty, but which is in reality another government to be imposed upon this people.

"It is the most astounding betrayal of trust that history records.

"Suppose President Wilson should tell you that during his private conferences with the kings and the capitalists of Europe he became convinced that the American colonists made a huge mistake when they fought to free themselves from European control.

"Suppose he should tell you that his Tory kinsfolk in England were right in opposing our Whig kinsfolk in America!

"Suppose he should say that we must undo what our Revolutionary forefathers did, surrender to foreign control the Government they established, and renounce the principles for which they sacrificed their lives!

"Suppose he should declare that the most dramatic and conclusive evidence of our sudden change of heart on this subject would be to make a public bonfire of the Declaration of Independence!

"Suppose he should declare that the most emphatic proof we can offer Europe of the fact that we have repudiated the time-honored policy of our Government would be to let the British ambassador publicly burn Washington's Farewell Address at the foot of the Washington Monument!

"Should he say such things as these, he would create a tempest of indignation throughout this Union, and his impeachment would be demanded.

"But his deeds since his second election can not be translated into any other words.

"What he has done is immensely more than equivalent to the destruction of the documents which contain the Declaration and of the Farewell Address.

"He has signed away independence itself; he has signed away the Americanism of the Farewell Address; he has surrendered what our forefathers gained under the shadow of a European crown.

"We, the people, are the sovereign. We, the people, wear the crown.

"That crown shall pass on to the next generation untarnished in its luster and radiant with every gem of Anglo-Saxon liberty.

"We can read our titles clear! By the light of the Revolutionary camp fires we can read our titles clear!

"Usurpers have moved our land lines and seized upon field after field that is ours; but by the God that made us, we will drive out the trespassers and regain full possession of our blood-bought inheritance."

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. EAGAN, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEENERSON, indefinitely, on account of duties in connection with the Post Office Commission.

To Mr. OLIVER, for five days, on account of important business.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal next Wednesday and the disposition of the business on the Speaker's table I be permitted to address the House for not to exceed 30 minutes on the industrial unrest in our country to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the rule requires that on Calendar Wednesday business can only be suspended by a two-thirds vote. The Chair is disposed to think that it is necessary, first, to dispense with the regular business on Calendar Wednesday. It has been the uniform policy of the Chair—not this Speaker but previous Speakers—to so rule. Can the gentleman make it some other day?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, can you not do anything by unanimous consent? Can you not dispense with Calendar Wednesday by unanimous consent?

Mr. WALSH. No; you can not.

The SPEAKER. You can dispense with Calendar Wednesday by unanimous consent.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW—11 O'CLOCK A. M.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman from Wyoming if he expects to have Calendar Wednesday stand this week?

Mr. MONDELL. I think we will probably take up Calendar Wednesday business. I can not say positively at this time, but it occurs to me if we meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning the gentleman from Ohio could submit his request and have his time to-morrow morning, and then the gentleman could go on with the dye bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The reason why I asked that question is it is probable that we shall not complete the consideration of the dye bill to-morrow.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, is my request objected to?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. COOPER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the routine business to-morrow morning I may be permitted to address the House for not to exceed 30 minutes on the industrial situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of the business on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6410. An act authorizing the city of Boulder, Colo., to purchase certain public lands.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to joint resolutions and bills of the following titles:

S. J. Res. 75. Authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to Belgium;

S. J. Res. 95. Authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents, cots, horses, and saddle equipments for the use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919;

S. 276. To amend sections 4 and 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916;

S. 277. To authorize absence by homestead settlers and entrymen, and for other purposes; and

S. 2624. To provide travel allowances for certain retired enlisted men and Regular Army reservists.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on September 20 the committee had presented to the White House for the approval of the President of the United States the following joint resolutions:

H. J. Res. 175. Joint resolution to provide for the payment of travel pay upon discharge to men of the Regular Army enlisted prior to April 2, 1917; and

H. J. Res. 211. Joint resolution tendering the thanks of the American people and the Congress of the United States to Gen. John J. Pershing and to the officers and men of the American Expeditionary Forces.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order, until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 23, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

Almighty God, we have built up a great spiritual democracy out of the precepts of Thy holy Word. The entering in of Thy Word giveth light. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a communication from the secretary of state of the State of Florida transmitting certain memorials and resolutions of the Florida Legislature, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The communication, resolutions, and memorials are as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
STATE OF FLORIDA,
Tallahassee, September 18, 1919.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith certified copy of house memorial No. 2, house memorial No. 4, senate concurrent resolution No. 9, house concurrent resolution No. 31, and house concurrent resolution No. 32, passed by the Legislature of Florida, 1919.

Yours, very truly,
H. CLAY CRAWFORD,
Secretary of State.

House concurrent resolution 31.

Whereas that historic event, known as the Florida Purchase, occurred on July 10, 1821; and

Whereas the Florida Purchase Centennial will occur on July 10, 1921, and an event of such importance should be fittingly commemorated and celebrated both by the nation at large as well as by the State of Florida; and

Whereas it is especially important that the nations of South America, for whom the people of the United States, and particularly the State of Florida, entertain the highest regard and most friendly feeling, should be most closely united in bonds of mutual good will, fellowship, and understanding with the people of North America, to the great benefit of their common social and commercial advantage; and

Whereas at this period in the history of the world, when an era of world-wide reconstruction and commercial development is at hand, and such development and reconstruction will be greatly assisted and promoted by an international exposition; and

Whereas it is especially fitting, at this the close of the World War, that all nations should unite in an exhibition of their industries, products, literature, and art, in order that world-wide commercial and social understanding, comprehension, and trade may be made as complete, full, and perfect as possible, and that national ideals and aspirations may be more fully understood and appreciated throughout the brotherhood of nations: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida, That the people of the State of Florida are in favor of commemorating the Florida Purchase Centennial by an international fair to be held in the State of Florida, dedicated on July 10, 1921, and inaugurated on Victory Day, November 11, 1922, and to run or continue 12 months after that time, and that the people of Florida do hereby suggest to the President and Congress of the United States that such an international fair be held for the purposes expressed in these resolutions, and that every effort be made to induce all nations of the world to participate in such exposition or international fair: Be it further

Resolved, That the President and Congress of the United States are hereby requested to undertake, create, and realize the conception contained in these resolutions by such means, instrumentalities, and national legislation as in their judgment are proper: Be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Florida is hereby requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States and to each House of Congress.

Approved June 9, 1919.

STATE OF FLORIDA,
Office of Secretary of State, ss:

I, H. Clay Crawford, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of house concurrent resolution 31, passed by the Legislature of Florida, 1919, and filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida, at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 18th day of September, A. D. 1919.

House concurrent resolution 32.

Whereas the construction of a canal from Cumberland Sound through the St. Marys River, thence to the Suwannee River, and through this river thence on to St Marks, on the Gulf, would be of untold advantage to the commerce of the Southeastern States, and especially the States of Georgia and Florida; and

Whereas by the routing of such a canal from Cumberland Sound through the St. Marys River, thence to the Suwannee River, and through this river thence on to St. Marks, on the Gulf, would entail the digging of only about 100 miles of such canal; and

Whereas the construction of such canal would open a water route for the coal fields of Alabama located on the Warrior River, and thereby reduce the traffic rates on this article; and

Whereas the construction of this canal would reduce the haul from the Southeast of all commerce going to Europe, South America, and Central America over 500 miles; and

Whereas it is believed that the cost of the construction of this canal would not compare with the benefits to the general commerce to be gained therefrom: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be petitioned to cause said proposed canal to be definitely located and constructed at as early a date as practicable.

Resolved further, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be urged to secure the final survey and construction of said canal to be made at as early a date as practicable and to assist in procuring the construction of said canal; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Florida be requested to furnish each of the Senators and Representatives aforesaid a copy of this memorial.

And respectfully requests the concurrence of the senate thereto.

Approved, June 9, 1919.

STATE OF FLORIDA,
Office of the Secretary of State, ss:

I, H. Clay Crawford, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of house concurrent resolution No. 32, passed by the Legislature of Florida, 1919, and filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida, at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 18th day of September, A. D. 1919.

Senate concurrent resolution 9.

Whereas every publication in this State and Nation has been inconvenienced and made to suffer in circulation, and consequent advertising patronage and business, as a result of the Federal zone Postal System; and

Whereas the newspapers of extensive circulation are great factors in education, in keeping the public informed, and, therefore, most helpful in the development of the country in every worthy way, it having been said that it would have been impossible to have won the war in so short a time or to have successfully put through any of the numerous drives for funds without the willing aid of the newspapers and other periodicals; and
